Mr. BACON. And I desire to say furthermore in regard to the matter while opinions are being expressed that, although no ruling can now be made, certainly under the rules of the Senate there is no limitation to the power of amendment, except so far as general parliamentary law may be invoked that a matter is not germane or otherwise pertinent to the particular subject in hand; but the question of the unanimous consent can not affect that parliamentary situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will permit the Chair a moment, the Chair was laboring under a misapprehension. The Chair understood the Senator from Missouri to suggest that the excise bill would be moved as a substitute for the sugar bill. Of course, the Chair can not make a ruling until the motion is actually made.

Mr. BACON. And so far as the question of its being an amendment or a substitute is concerned, a substitute is only an amendment; it is one form of amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that.

Mr. BACON When adopted, it takes the place of the original proposition and becomes the original proposition. It is a radical amendment; that is the difference between it and a partial amendment; but, none the less, it is an amendment and has all the incidents, features, rights, privileges, and possibilities of an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HEYBURN, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. STONE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. STONE. I desire, Mr. President, to be perfectly frank about it——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thought I was recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho first addressed the Chair and was recognized.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to suggest that if we fix a date certain to vote upon the excise bill, it ought not to be in order to bring it up at an earlier time, either in the nature of an amendment or as a substitute. It would not be strictly in accordance with the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement to do that. I make that suggestion so that the question ought not to arise.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was about to make the same suggestion as that just made by the Senator from Idaho. If we had only a unanimous-consent agreement providing for a vote on the wool bill and the sugar bill, of course it would be open to any Senator to move the excise bill as an amendment to either bill; but when we make a third unanimous-consent agreement to consider that particular bill, if that bill is then moved as an amendment to one of the previous bills, we nullify the third unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire, in connection with the request made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], to couple with it a request that on Monday, July 29, after the routine morning business, the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill providing for a Territorial government for Alaska, and to conclude the consideration of that bill on that day; otherwise, I shall object to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WARREN and others. Do not do that.

Mr. JONES. Unless some disposition is made of the bill providing for a Territorial government for Alaska, I shall have to object.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Washington——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am as anxious as is the Senator from Washington to dispose of the Alaska civil government bill. It is on the calendar, and I propose to bring it up at the earliest opportunity. I think, however, that, in the interest of that bill, unanimous consent as requested ought to be granted. I believe that if we get these controverted points out of the way and can go to the calendar, the Alaska bill will receive earlier consideration than it otherwise would, and I am very anxious indeed that the bill shall be considered.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to ask my colleague from Washington [Mr. JONES] to consider this: I am as anxious as he is to get the matter of which he speaks under consideration; but there will be any amount of time for that and all other matters on the calendar before it would be possible to compose the differences of the two Houses on the several pending appropriation bills now in conference and yet to go to conference. If you delay the appropriation bills, you must understand that you can count on not less than 30 days from the time you pass the appropriation bill that is now before us—we must remain in session that length of time—before there is any possibility of finally arriving at the time when all the appropriation bills may pass and secure the signature of the President. I shall join the Senator in endeavoring to secure consideration at a later time for the bill to which he has referred; but I do not believe it is best to load too heavily the present proposition, which already covers three important matters.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that I know the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is very anxious to have the Alaska government bill considered, and that he is using every effort to have that measure brought to a vote by the Senate. I have been here long enough, however, to know how these matters go and to know that when we get the tariff bills, which are generally recognized as very important matters, out of the way, some other matters which are very important locally, but not very important generally, are likely to fall by the wayside. I am going to insist, so far as I am concerned, that the Senate take action upon the Alaska bill; but, with the assurances I have from various Senators now with reference to the matter, I will not embarrass the request for unanimous consent with the suggestion I made a moment ago, and so I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I want to state frankly that it was my intention, if no one else did it, inasmuch as the sugar bill is to be taken up in advance of the excise bill, to offer the last-named bill as an amendment to the sugar bill. I had supposed that under the terms of the agreement as drawn any amendment would be in order; but, to put it beyond question, I submitted the inquiry I made. The Chair, so far as the Chair went, intimated that the ruling would be against the right to offer the excise bill under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement as an amendment to the sugar bill, and Senators upon the other side——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand the Chair to make that intimation. I understood the Chair to hold that a substitute would not be in order.

Mr. STONE. Nevertheless——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the present occupant of the Chair shall be presiding at that time, he will consider the matter when it is presented to him; but at present he would not feel like making any definite ruling.

Mr. STONE. I understand that; but, so far as the Chair went, it was along the line I have suggested, and three or four leading Senators on the other side have stated that the amendment suggested would not be in order under the agreement.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing and anxious to have the first request for unanimous consent relating to the woolen bill agreed to; I am perfectly willing and anxious to have the order relating to the sugar bill and the excise bill agreed to; but I do not feel disposed to allow an advanced consideration of the sugar bill and have it voted down, as it probably will be by the majority on the other side, and then be confronted with the argument that there was no Treasury need, no financial requirement of the Government, for the passage of the excise bill. My contention is that, if the sugar bill as it came from the other House should be adopted, the loss of revenue growing out of that should be supplemented by the excise bill and would put those of us who are in favor of the passage of these bills at a disadvantage if they should be taken in the order named.

Now I will ask the Senator from Utah if he is willing to agree to either one of two propositions—to place the excise bill in advance of the sugar bill, or, secondly, to have it understood that the excise bill may, if desired, be offered as an amendment to the sugar bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the logical way to consider the bills is to consider the sugar bill first. If that is defeated, and the present rates on sugar are maintained, I think myself there will be no necessity for the passage of the excise bill. But to reverse them I think would be absolutely wrong.

I want to be frank with the Senator from Missouri, and to say that the understanding I have is that the bills shall be voted upon just as the order has been presented. I would not ask that they be voted upon as a matter of unanimous consent unless they are voted upon just as they have been presented. Nor do I think it would be proper, under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, for the Senator to offer the excise bill as an amendment to the sugar bill, for the reason that in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement we agree to vote upon that particular proposition on the day following.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Senator from Utah to consent to this suggestion, for I do not wish to object. I am as anxious as I can be to have these measures taken up and disposed of. But I want it done in a way that I think is fair to those of us who support the measures, and I think they ought not to be presented in a way that puts us at a disadvantage.

I suggest to the Senator that this request be left unacted upon and pending until to-morrow morning, so that we may have some consultation in regard to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator desires to object, I have no——

Mr. STONE. I am asking the Senator to consent to that course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will adopt that course. I was just going to suggest it when the Senator from Missouri rose.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I will withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah withdraws the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAPP subsequently said:

As I came into the Senate there was some talk of a unanimous-consent agreement. When the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was passed in 1909, a corporation-tax amendment was brought in here which in terms exempts the trusts and combinations from the payment of the tax, which is purely an excise tax for the privilege of being a corporation.

I shall feel constrained to object to any unanimous-consent agreement that is so framed that at some point an amendment can not be offered to the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, repealing the exemption of the trusts and combinations from the corporation tax.

Mr. LODGE. Every one of the bills mentioned in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement is in that position.

Mr. CLAPP. I thought so until I heard the question of the Senator from Missouri as to whether or not the excise bill could be put in as an amendment to the sugar bill.

Mr. LODGE. That question related to a specific bill, as to which there was another unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAPP. That is all right. I understood the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri was that this agreement might be so framed that only the bills as they now stand could be voted upon.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAPP. And I want to give notice that the unanimous-consent agreement must be so framed that——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is a good deal of conversation on the floor; and while the Senator generally speaks in a loud tone, he turned in the opposite direction, and I did not catch the exact point of his remarks.

Mr. LODGE. It is all over.

Mr. CLAPP. It is all over; but I will state it again, if the Senator desires.

When I came into the Senate I heard the Senator from Missouri discussing a proposed unanimous-consent agreement as though the agreement would preclude an amendment to the sugar bill. It occurred to me that the agreement was being so framed that perhaps it would preclude amendments generally to the bills as they now stand. I therefore gave notice that I could not consent to the agreement unless it permitted an amendment repealing the exemption of the trusts from the payment of the corporation tax incorporated in the Payne-Aldrich bill three years ago.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like now to inquire from Senators on the other side of the Chamber——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to make a request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now wish to inquire of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber if it will be possible to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the wool bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, the only proper course is to do what we started to do—to vote upon all the tariff bills. I would not feel like saying to the Senator that we could vote upon the wool bill independently. I should very much prefer to leave the matter open, as requested, for further consideration.

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

"That section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers,' approved June 24, 1910, be amended so that it will read as follows:

"'SECTION 1. That from and after October 1, 1912, it shall be unlawful for any steamer of the United States or of any foreign country navigating the ocean or the Great Lakes and licensed to carry, or carrying, 50 or more persons, including passengers or crew or both, to leave or attempt to leave any port of the United States unless such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient apparatus for radio communication, in good working order, capable of transmitting and receiving messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night.

"'An auxiliary power supply, independent of the vessel's main electric power plant, must be provided which will enable the sending set for at least four hours to send messages over a distance of at least 100 miles, day or night, and efficient communication between the operator in the radio room and the bridge shall be maintained at all times.

"'The radio equipment must be in charge of two or more persons skilled in the use of such apparatus, one or the other of whom shall be on duty at all times while the vessel is being navigated. Such equipment, operators, the regulation of their watches, and the transmission and receipt of messages, except as may be regulated by law or international agreement, shall be under the control of the master, in the case of a vessel of the United States; and every willful failure on the part of the master to enforce at sea the provisions of this paragraph as to equipment, operators, and watches shall subject him to a penalty of $100.

"'That the provisions of this section shall not apply to steamers plying between ports or places less than 200 miles apart.'

"'SEC. 2. That this act, so far as it relates to the Great Lakes, shall take effect on and after April 1, 1913, and so far as it relates to ocean cargo steamers shall take effect on and after July 1, 1913: Provided, That on cargo steamers, in lieu of the second operator provided for in this act, there may be substituted a member of the crew or other person who shall be duly certified and entered in the ship's log as competent to receive and understand distress calls or other usual calls indicating danger, and to aid in maintaining a constant wireless watch so far as required for the safety of life.'"

And the House agree to the same.

The report was agreed to.

LAND IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to be furnished with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 west front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 774, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District (H. Res. 634); and there being no objection, the request was ordered to be complied with.

CORBETT TUNNEL, WYOMING—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 878).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

For the reasons stated in the letter of July 12 of the Secretary of the Interior, which accompanies this message, I return without approval Senate bill 4862, entitled "An act for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett Tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project."

I do this because I think this legislation is of retroactive character and imposes on certain of the reclamation settlers an additional burden over and above the contract price of the work done, increasing that price by a double payment of part of what was due under the contract from the reclamation fund to the principal contractors. At the time when the work was begun and continued there was no law which relieved the subcontractor or the material man from the necessity of looking after the collection of what the contractor owed him, or which imposed on the Government or the reclamation authorities the duty of seeing to it that the money paid under the principal contract was used by the principal contractor to pay his subcontractors or material men. To require that this additional amount should now be included in the assessment upon the lands is by law to increase a contract burden by a change of the character of the liability after it has been assumed and fixed. This is retroactive and is legislation in its nature unjust to the reclamation settlers.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 18, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President's message and the accompanying document be printed and lie on the table, subject to be called up by me at a later day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the President's message and the accompanying document be printed and lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 21094. An act to create a commission on industrial relations was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

ANNIE R. SCHLEY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on Monday, the 15th instant, conferees were appointed by the Chair on the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley. One of the conferees was the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. The Senator from Oklahoma left the city the day after, I think, and will not be back for some time. Therefore I ask that the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] be appointed to fill his place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business.

VOTES ON EXCISE, WOOL, AND SUGAR BILLS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Utah if he would not consent to change the order in the unanimous-consent proposition he submitted a little while ago, so as to allow a vote upon the excise measure before the sugar bill.

Mr. SMOOT. After consultation with a number of Senators interested in this proposition, I find there is no objection to that program, and therefore I offer the order I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah submits an order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 25, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

"And, further, it is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, July 26, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21214) to extend the special excise tax now levied with respect to doing business by corporations to persons, and to provide revenue for the Government by levying a special excise tax with respect to doing business by individuals and copartnerships, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

"And, further, it is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 27, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21213) to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties,' etc. (known as the sugar bill), and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, with the assurance given me with respect to my request in connection with the bill I then mentioned, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I did not make the point of order because I realized that the unanimous-consent agreement was a matter in which we are all very much interested, but I do wish to give notice that hereafter I shall ask for the observance of the rule that no Senator shall interrupt the Senator on the floor by another matter.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Without detaining the Senate to read it, I send to the Secretary's desk an extract from the report of the Liverpool Shipowners' Association in regard to Suez Canal tolls, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD; and, also, two or three extracts from one of the London newspapers on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order will be made.

The matter is as follows:

LIVERPOOL SHIPOWNERS' ASSOCIATION AND SUEZ TOLLS.

The Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association is the largest shipping organization in the world. Its membership includes the owners of 4,174,403 tons of British steamships, or over 22 per cent of all the steam tonnage under the British flag.

The report of the association of its last annual meeting, February 1, 1912, contains the following:

"Suez Canal: The following resolution was adopted unanimously at the imperial conference:

"'This conference is of opinion that the dues levied upon shipping for using the Suez Canal constitute a heavy charge and tend to retard the trade within the empire and with other countries, and invites the Government of the United Kingdom to continue to use their influence for the purpose of obtaining a substantial reduction of the present charges.'"

Mr. McKinnon Wood, in supporting the resolution, expressed the entire sympathy of the British Government with the views expressed by Mr. Fisher on behalf of Australia in moving the resolution, and assured the conference that the British Government would never allow its interests as shareholders to deter it for one moment from pressing for such reductions in the dues as were at all possible. He further pointed out that as the representation of the British Government on the board of the Suez Canal Co. was only about one-tenth, the most the Government could do was to exercise its influence in bringing about the reduction in the dues so urgently needed.

In view of the position taken up by the Government, the association, continuing the practice it has followed for a number of years in its annual reports, gives the following summary of the Suez Canal figures to date:

Great Britain received in dividends on its shareholding in the canal company during last year £1,129,260. Great Britain has now received upward of £17,000,000, as against its original investment, 35 years ago, of £4,000,000. This extraordinary return from the capital invested has been obtained from dues which exceed by 100 per cent the cost of working the canal. These dues are as to 60 per cent collected from British ships, and therefore, although the whole of the £1,000,000 received yearly by this country is treated as dividend, it is in fact derived as to 60 per cent from a most onerous tax levied on our trade with the East.

The trade are unwilling payers of this onerous tax and, as Mr. McKinnon Wood has made it clear that the British Government are unwilling receivers, the association would submit that the time has now come when means should be found, and without waiting for the conversion of the other shareholders, by which at least £600,000 of the dividends unwillingly received by the British Government should be applied in the general relief of the British trades suffering from the tax.

[From the London Morning Post, January 2–3, 1912.]

The Committee on Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives has been to Panama to inspect the progress made on the canal and to determine the tolls to be paid by ships passing through it. The committee has just returned, and its members are agreed that tolls should range between 2s. and 4s. per ton for vessels flying foreign flags, but that a preference should be accorded to the American mercantile marine. The majority, it is said, go so far as to advocate the free use of the canal to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

This second proposal, of course, does not really concern other countries, since the coasting trade of the United States is already restricted to native shipping. But foreign nations, and especially Great Britain, will be directly affected by any system of tolls so arranged as to give a preference to American vessels engaged in foreign traffic.

EQUAL TREATMENT FOR ALL.

Sir Owen Philipps, whose name is prominently before the public as the head of the largest shipping combination in the world, said: "I hope that the American Nation may see their way to make the passage across the Panama Isthmus as free as the ocean, and so lead to the canal doing the maximum amount of good to the trade of the world. But if they should decide to fix the tolls, as mentioned in your paragraph, at something between 2s. and 4s. a ton it is of the utmost importance to British shipping that the vessels of all nations should be treated exactly alike. As regards American ships trading exclusively between United States ports on the Atlantic and the ports of that country on the Pacific—trade which is exclusively confined to steamers built in the United States—British vessels would not be adversely affected if in this case only United States ships were allowed to pass through the canal free of dues.

"The present cost of running American ships is undoubtedly very considerably more than the cost of running British ships. But I do not think that is any argument to justify exceptional treatment being accorded to United States vessels going through the Panama Canal except those in the coasting trade, as it is quite possible a few years hence the position may be entirely reversed."

NO EFFECT ON BRITISH SHIPPING.

"A proposal of this sort raises the whole question of treaty relationship," remarked another authority on shipping matters. "There are certain people in America who think it is absolutely impossible for such a preference to be given, more particularly because of the pledges which the United States Government gave when she intimated her intention to construct the canal. But after all is said and done, from the point of view of foreign shipping, I think it is a relatively small matter. It sounds, perhaps, as though the preferential treatment would do a great deal for American shipping, but, as a matter of fact, it will do very little. Practically all the United States shipping is nowadays engaged in the coastwise business, and whether under this legal monopoly they are able to carry goods from New York and San Francisco a little cheaper does not matter to us in the least. Any reduction of the canal dues will only enable the shippers to compete with the transcontinental railways of the United States. That, I believe, is the point of the whole thing."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. At the same time, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter I send to the desk, with the accompanying resolution, which has to do with the question of allowing vessels in which a railroad may have any interest to go through the canal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COTTON GOODS EXPORT ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
July 17, 1912.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SENATOR: I have the honor to hand you herewith copy of resolution passed by the board of directors of the Cotton Goods Export Association of New York, in relation to H. R. 21969, Calendar No. 771, an act to provide for the operation, etc., of the Panama Canal, and ask your attention to it.

Very respectfully, HOWARD AYRES, Secretary.

Copy of resolution passed by the board of directors of the Cotton Goods Export Association of New York, July 17, 1912.

Whereas it is of the utmost importance to merchants and manufacturers of the United States doing business with oriental countries to have suitable and adequate freight accommodation for merchandise exported and imported; and

Whereas the opening of the Panama Canal should provide means for increasing the shipping facilities of a growing trade: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the use of that waterway should be as free of restrictions as possible; that such a restriction as is made in lines 12 to 16, inclusive, beginning at the word "Provided," of section 11 of the Senate draft of H. R. 21969, Calendar No. 771, is so destructive of opportunity for freight employment of vessels coming under the other provisions of the section and the whole bill as to prohibit the building and operation of vessels for that route and trade; that all necessary protection against abuse of the privileges of the canal by such vessels is given by other parts of the bill and other laws; that the Senate of the United States be requested, in the interest of the merchants and manufacturers of the United States trading with the Orient, to strike out of the bill section 11, lines 12 to 16, the words: "Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I was saying some time ago, in view of these contending theories, in view of these differences of opinion about the treaties, in view of the fact that we can have no positive knowledge in advance of what is going to happen in the canal after it is open for business and business has gone on for a year or two, it seems to me the most sensible thing to do, the thing that certainly we could make no mistake about and never could be blamed for doing, would be to open the canal to all vessels that want to go through it and charge them all a just and reasonable price for the service we render to them in putting them through.

After operating the canal a year or two years and figuring up the amount of tolls received from the vessels, with some experience as to whether or not we might have to reduce the tolls to get the business as against our competitor, the Suez Canal, we would be in a better position to judge as to whether it was necessary to attempt to give—even if we could do so under the treaties—free tolls to American shipping or free tolls to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade, which, if we can give free tolls, need the free tolls and the help much more than the domestic shipping, which already has a monopoly of the market, secure from competition with foreigners, and is fairly prosperous at the present time.

If it were left to me to decide, I would not even inquire into the ownership of a vessel that appeared in the Atlantic or the Pacific Ocean and asked for passage through the canal any more than I would inquire into the ownership of a vessel that appeared in the harbor of New York. I would say, in relation to vessels in which a railroad might have some interest, "I will not pass a law to absolutely debar every vessel in the country in which a railroad may be interested, with which it competes, from going through an American canal on which we have spent $400,000,000 any more than I would debar the railroad-owned steamships that may be upon the high seas from coming into an American port."

To say that no steamship in which a railroad has any interest shall go through the canal would put every steamboat that is owned or held by a corporation at the absolute mercy of any railroad that wanted to go into the market and buy 10 shares of the stock of the company. Any railroad that had a grievance against a competing steamship line could go into the market and buy a small interest in it. Railroad ownership of 1 share would be enough, under section 11 of the House bill, to absolutely debar the vessels of that line from the use of the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is so much conversation in the Hall that I am sure it must be annoying to the Senator who is addressing the Senate. It is very difficult for us to hear him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia makes the point of order that there is so much confusion in the Senator Chamber that it is difficult for the Senator from Connecticut to be heard. The Chair sustains the point of order, and requests Senators to preserve order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to suggest to the Senator that I think he misreads the House bill. He has a copy of it there. I should like to call his attention to the fact that the bill as it passed the House does not have the effect he suggests, but the amendment inserted by the Senate committee does have that effect. The House bill did not do so, because the penalty in the House bill was on the railroads that bought the shares of steamship stock, not on the steamship lines.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. But in either case, Mr. President, I would not for a year or two inquire into the ownership of vessels that went through. I assume that the American Congress would not want, if it could, to debar all vessels in which its own railroads might be interested from going through the canal, while at the same time allowing the railroad-owned vessels of foreign powers to go through the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. The provision of the bill forbids only the railroad-owned ships that compete with the roads from going through the canal. How could an English railroad-owned steamship compete with the railroad that owned it in traffic through the canal?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know. But I say if an American railroad has some interest in a steamship line or a steamboat, with which it may compete under the language of this bill—and any railroad that owns a steamboat line may compete with it if it wants to transfer the operations of its steamboat line so as to make it compete—I say if that is so, why should we adopt a policy which would result in letting the foreign railroad-owned steamboats into the canal while keeping out our own?

I call attention to the statement of Dr. Johnson before the Senate committee. I will read briefly and rapidly some of his views.

Dr. Johnson said, on page 26 of the Senate committee hearings:

> The canal will perform two functions—one of aiding of commerce and the other of aiding our Navy and our military establishment. The canal, it seems to me, may properly be required to carry itself as a commercial highway. Our expenses at the canal per annum will be $4,000,000 for the operation and maintenance of the canal and the government of the zone. The interest on our investment will be eleven and a quarter millions more, making fifteen and a quarter million dollars for operation and interest. The military establishment on the Isthmus will cost nearly as much more, apparently. I do not think the canal revenues should be required to meet the military expenditure of perhaps $14,000,000 to $15,000,000 per annum. But the expenses for maintaining the canal as a commercial route, including the interest on the investment, may properly be derived from the canal tolls.
> Senator BRISTOW. Why would you charge the interest on the investment in the construction of this canal any more than you would on the investment in the improvement of rivers and harbors to commerce?
> Dr. JOHNSON. The Panama Canal is a world highway; and certainly the use of that world highway by the shipping of other people than those of the United States should be charged for in proportion to the service rendered by the canal. When we come to American shipping, there are two general problems involved. The canal will be the most expensive work that we have ever put through. The time has come, in my judgment, when we can not wisely continue indefinitely to finance such great public works as the Panama Canal out of the general budget, if revenues can be secured without limiting the usefulness of such a public work and without burdening the commerce that is benefited.
> As I said in my introductory remarks, I do not believe a toll of 5 or 6 per cent of the freight rate will be burdensome, or that it will restrict the use of the canal. It will be wise to adopt and adhere to business principles in our canal-toll policy.
> Senator BRISTOW. Now, as far as the use of the canal by foreign countries in handling their own commerce with foreign countries is concerned, it seems to me that there is no argument against charging a toll. They ought to pay for the use of this highway which we with our money have constructed, and they ought to pay us a fair rate for its use. Then, as I understand, the question as to whether or not any rate shall be charged for American commerce depends upon whether we feel justified in spending as much money as we have without levying some toll or contribution on the commerce—our own commerce that passed through the canal; and, necessarily, if we thought that we should levy some charge in order that the commerce might bear some of this burden, the amount of the charge which would be justified would be a subject for consideration, would it not?
> Dr. JOHNSON. Yes. Of course, you are now considering this as a purely national question, and not with reference to any international questions that may be involved.
> Senator BRISTOW. Yes. You suggested that the President should be authorized to fix the tolls. Why should they not be fixed by law?
> Dr. JOHNSON. The tolls should be fixed and should be changed from time to time, with reference to traffic and revenue, and should be dealt with administratively rather than by formal statute. The canal should be so operated as to be of maximum service to the commerce of the United States and the trade of the world, and the administration of it should not unnecessarily be hampered by rigid statutes. It will be better, if Congress deems it wise to do so, to give the Executive latitude in the operation and management of the canal.

Now, as to the question of interest in steamboats by railroads with which they do or may compete, on page 31 Senator BRISTOW asked:

> Senator BRISTOW. Your last remark in your formal statement was that the Congress should not undertake to regulate the kind of vessels that should use the canal, or the relation between the vessels that use the canal and the railroads, or modify in any way the interstate-commerce law. Why did you make that statement? Because you do not believe it ought to be done or——
> Dr. JOHNSON. The first consideration, I think, is that of not endangering the enactment of the canal bill.
> Senator BRISTOW. Suppose it might endanger it not to put that in, as to the relationship between the steamship and railroad companies?
> Dr. JOHNSON. In that case I should hope Congress would remain in session until it had wisely worked out an act amending the interstate-commerce law.
> Senator BRISTOW. There are some who believe, you know, that the question as to the relations of the steamships that use the canal with the railroads is just as vital as the tolls or any other feature of the canal legislation.
> Dr. JOHNSON. I think they are extremely important. I believe that a careful investigation should be made as to the actual relation of steamship companies to each other and to the railroads, and the situation found to exist should be carefully dealt with by law. I am doubtful if Congress now possesses the necessary information, but I believe it has set machinery at work to secure the information. It is my thought that the regulation of carriers by water should be as carefully worked out as the regulation of carriers by land; but that is such a large and complicated question that it would seem wiser not to tie up the canal bill until that question can be solved.
> Senator BRISTOW. But the canal bill must deal with that question, in the opinion of a great many, and it is just as essential to deal with that as it is to deal with any other phase of commerce by way of the canal, and it appears to me that this is the opportune and proper time rather than to defer it. You might just as well defer any other important matter relating to the canal.
> Dr. JOHNSON. I know, Senator, there are those that share that feeling, but I think Congress is now ready to act upon the government of the zone; upon authorizing the President to fix the tolls and to mold the canal-construction force into an operating force. Congress has the information on those problems, but on the question of amending the interstate-commerce law and providing for the regulation of carriage by water, I doubt whether Congress has, or will have at this session, the requisite data.
> Senator BRISTOW. By the regulation of carriers by water you mean one to another?
> Dr. JOHNSON. And to the railroads?
> Senator BRISTOW. Yes; that is a question of opinion whether we have sufficient information for that now——
> Senator JONES. It is a question of principle or policy rather than regulation.
> Senator BRISTOW. I think it is both a question of policy and opinion.
> Senator PAGE. Would it not seem likely that the combination of these different matters in one bill would necessarily defer the passage of the rate bill and zone government?
> Dr. JOHNSON. That, I think, is a fact, Senator PAGE, and that is the chief reason why I raised the question. I wish to urge upon the committee the necessity for action upon the canal bill at this session and not to endanger this bill by endeavoring to solve what all must admit is a highly controversial question.

Senator JONES. But it is a very important question in connection with the charging of tolls, is it not?

Dr. JOHNSON. I do not think it is, Senator JONES. I think it is rather a question of policy as regards the regulation of rail and water carriers. You have to decide whether to attempt forcibly to separate the ownership of rail and water lines or to permit the railroad-owned lines to use the canal under Government regulation.

There are those who believe that prohibiting railroad companies from owning and operating steamship lines will be followed by active competition among numerous coastwise carriers and that the facilities resulting will be larger than they will be if the railroads are permitted to own steamships and run them through the canal. On the other hand, there are those who point out the fact that on the Pacific coast at the present time most of the lines are under railroad control, that a large part of the lines on the Atlantic seaboard are under railroad control, and that the policy of prohibiting the railroads from owning ships using the canal may result in the canal being used to but slight extent for traffic between our seaboards. The choice is between a policy of regulation and a policy of prohibition. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the water frontage at terminals is largely controlled by the railroads, and it would be difficult for independent lines to come in and get a footing. It is a big and complicated question. I think we all appreciate that, and I hope Congress will face it fairly and squarely, but I do hope that Congress will not try to solve that question before it enacts the canal bill.

Senator BRISTOW. Why do you think a railroad company wants to own a steamship line that competes with it?

Dr. JOHNSON. It does not want to own a line that competes with it.

Senator BRISTOW. Well, they do! do they not?

Dr. JOHNSON. They own lines that complement their services.

Senator BRISTOW. Do they not own lines that compete with them?

Dr. JOHNSON. You doubtless have in mind the Old Colony Steamboat Co. and the Pacific Mail and lines of that kind. I do not think the New Haven road owns and runs the Old Colony Line as a competing line; nor do I suppose the Southern Pacific owns the Pacific Mail to run it as a competing line. In general, the railroads have extended their services on the ocean and on the lakes both to control competition and to develop more complete transportation facilities. That policy has enabled them to control transportation rates by water, to a large extent, as well as by rail, and it unquestionably calls for legislation. Whether it calls for legislation to compel separate ownership of the two carriers or not is a question upon which I do not wish to express a final opinion at the present time.

Senator BRISTOW. Do you think that a railroad company should be permitted to own a steamship line that competes with itself?

Dr. JOHNSON. I do not think that any steamship line that competes with a railroad company is owned by a railroad company. Common ownership of rail and water lines eliminates competition.

Senator BRISTOW. Suppose, as a matter of fact, it was demonstrated that it did own such a line that was competing with itself; do you think the Government ought to permit that?

Dr. JOHNSON. I should permit it and regulate it.

Senator BRISTOW. Why would you permit a railroad to purchase or establish a steamship line competing with itself for traffic?

Dr. JOHNSON. As I said before, I do not think there is such a situation.

Senator BRISTOW. That would be a question of fact. I think it could be demonstrated that such conditions do acutally exist, but I will not go into the question of determining the fact, but assume that the fact does exist; if it does not exist, of course, then, the question falls; but if it does, why would you permit it to own a steamship line that competes with itself and then regulate its operation? What would be the object of it?

Dr. JOHNSON. To secure maximum transportation facilities for the public, which, of course, must also be the object of legislation. Congress will have to determine whether the prohibition of the common ownership of rail and water lines will result in more efficient and more extensive transportation facilities than can be secured by the permission of the common ownership of rail and water lines and the regulation of them by public authority.

Senator BRISTOW. Do you think that competition in transportation is desirable?

Dr. JOHNSON. Regulated competition, I think, is desirable.

Senator BRISTOW. Do you think it is possible for a man to compete with himself for the same traffic?

Dr. JOHNSON. I do not think a man does compete with himself for the same traffic.

Senator BRISTOW. Of course; he does not, but you said you would permit him to compete with himself and then regulate him in that competition.

Dr. JOHNSON. I would permit the railroads to own water lines and subject both the rail and water lines to the same regulation. I come to that conclusion, Senator, because I believe that there is very little real competition in rates among steamship lines. We have all come to agree that where there are several railroads serving the same section, it is necessary to regulate their charges and, to some extent, their services. We recognize that they have the power to introduce a large degree of monopoly into their rate making. I think practically the same situation exists among several steamship lines running between common termini. The facts are well enough known now to enable one to say that practically all the steamship lines operating under those conditions—several lines between common termini—are members of conferences; that their rates are common and subject to agreement, and that, while monopoly has not been so completely established between carriers by water as between carriers by rail, monopoly conditions are increasing among carriers by water. Such being the fact, it would seem wise to provide for the regulation of regular steamship lines upon the same principles as have been found effective in the regulation of rail carriers.

I agree that this question of rates charged by steamship lines in interstate and foreign commerce by these common carriers ought to be put under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think the time is coming when it will be just as necessary to do that as it has been to put the railroads under that jurisdiction. But I say for a year or two, until Congress can get more information than it now has, I would open the canal to everybody who will pay the price of going through it; and if at any time any abuse occurs by reason of the ownership or interest of any railroad in any steamship line I would put those steamship lines immediately under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with authority to fix just and reasonable rates and authority to order that any practice or abuse which was improper or against the interests of the public should cease forthwith. If the Interstate Commerce Commission has been able to be of any use in regulating what is a monopoly a great deal more absolute, the railroads, I think it will be of equal efficiency with the steamboats. I can see no inherent impossibility or even difficulty in a commission determining from adequate investigation, with sufficient help and statistics before it, what would be a just and reasonable rate on either package or cargo freight from the city of New York via the canal to San Francisco than there is in determining what would be a just and reasonable rate per carload or otherwise upon a train running from New York to Chicago.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator will admit that Commissioners Lane and Prouty do not agree with him in that view.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Later on I think I will insert in the RECORD the testimony of Commissioners Prouty and Lane in relation to this subject, and if any Senator will say to me that he is willing to cast his vote on this question on his deductions from that testimony I shall have no quarrel with him about his vote. I will simply say that in substance neither one of them would say that he would advise any member of the committee or of Congress to vote for section 11 of the House bill, to the restoration of which the Senator from Kansas has dedicated himself, in the Senate, if it is possible to do so. Judge Prouty stated perfectly frankly and decisively that, so far as the ownership of steamboats on the Lakes by the New York Central, the Western Transit Co.'s boats, or the steamboats on Long Island Sound owned by the New England Navigation Co., which in turn is owned by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., he would not advocate the dismemberment of that railroad ownership from that steamship ownership, and thought that both the shippers and the receivers of freight were better served now than they would be under separate ownership. He did say that if it was to be done over again he would not let that concentrated condition and joint ownership come about, but as it existed he thought more damage would be done in the attempt to dissolve it and taking the chance of what might be substituted in the place of it. I agree with him on that. That, however, I do not think will be a serious matter of contention here. There is no demand at all comparable with the opposition in New England to this legislation which would divorce the Sound steamboats from the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.

The question here in the canal bill, which will be controverted and upon which there is a fair difference of opinion, is whether it is necessary now to say that no railroad which has an interest in a steamboat line with which it may compete shall be allowed to send its vessels through the Panama Canal. Whether we shall say that, or whether we shall allow them all to go through now, either with or without supervision and regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the minute any bad practice or ill effect is felt bring them under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I say in all these matters I think it is wiser to open the canal with the greatest freedom. I do not believe that one party, whether it be an ocean line steamship company or a railroad, transcontinental or otherwise, will put steamboats on that canal without others doing the same thing. For my part I regard the Southern Pacific, with its ownership of the Pacific Mail, practically as a double-track railroad. The parallel is by water. Farther south the freights naturally separate themselves into such classes of freight as prefer the all-rail route, and the bulkier kinds of freight that prefer the cheaper water route. As far as I am concerned, I should think it would be perfectly safe to let all the transcontinental railroads build their own parallel steamship lines, and then with joint rail and water lines compete system by system with each other and with the freight steamship companies of the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Apropos of what the Senator has just said, does the Senator think that they now compete with each other in fact?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That who compete?

Mr. REED. The railroads.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I think that Government regulation is probably to a large extent inconsistent with competition.

Mr. REED. If the railroads do not compete as railroads, does the Senator think that with road-built boat lines they would then compete as railroads and as boat lines any more than they do now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure that they would, but the situation would be no worse. I think if they were regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission no injury could flow from it, if the rate was just and reasonable.

Mr. REED. I was directing my interrogatory to the remark of the Senator that he thought we ought to allow them all to use the canal and all compete. If they do not compete as railroads why would they compete as railroads and as boat lines all combined under the same ownership that the railroads now hold by?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suppose there is some competition among them, of course, now, and would be, according to the better service and the class of boats that were put on, and so forth; but, of course, if they were placed under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission they would compete within very narrow limits. If there was a maximum rate beyond which they could not charge or a minimum rate below which they were not allowed to cut rates in competition, the competition would be, as it is among the railroads now, within very narrow limits.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of competition. Is it not a fact that for all practical purposes to-day these transcontinental roads only compete in the sense that each of them tries to get all the business it can at the same price charged by the others? There is no real competition in prices or rates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think perhaps the Senator is more familiar with that matter than I am. He is a western man and I am an eastern man, and I have had very little knowledge of the transcontinental railroads; but I assume it makes very little difference to a shipper in New York, whether it is to Chicago or to San Francisco, which route he ships by over the rails. If the time is equal the charge is about the same.

Mr. REED. As far as I am concerned, if the Senator will allow me just a word, I am not willing to strike down the principle of competition and to substitute for it the principle of regulation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. REED. No; I was rather making my remark supplementary or explanatory of my question. I say I am not willing to strike down the principle of competition and substitute for it the principle of regulation. Certainly on land we can go much further with the proposition of regulation than we have gone up to this time. If we are to substitute regulation for competition, then it is perfectly patent we must get at a basis where the actual investment of all the transportation companies has to be ascertained and the fair value of their physical property determined, and the regulation must be upon a basis which starts from that fixed point.

To my mind the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission up to this date—and I speak with due respect for that commission—has been a lamentable failure. It has helped to reduce certain evils, but it has gone far from the eradication of those evils. I have little respect for that kind of regulation which after extending for 10 or 15 years still permits a condition where goods can be shipped across the continent and then back half way, or nearly half way, across the continent in the opposite direction cheaper than they can be shipped directly to the intermediate point. That kind of regulation is not the kind I am looking for in this bill or in any other.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I was saying, Mr. President, my idea is, in brief, to open this canal with as little restriction as possible, the effect of which we may not foresee; and Congress being in session every year twice a year, generally, and sometimes all the year, if any abuse appears there after a year or two years' demonstrated experience, I think Congress can be relied upon to correct it.

Mr. President, I have said a great deal more than I thought I would say and occupied more time than I intended, but I have been interrupted somewhat.

While we were down on the canal taking testimony there was a bill prepared which I had printed for the use of the committee and which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD. It is a bill which was drawn by the law officer of the Panama Canal Commission and represents his views of the shortest and most concise measure that could be put into operation with the fewest complications of any. I simply insert it for what it is worth to anybody in this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill to provide for the government of the Canal Zone, the construction and operation of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal now being constructed thereon, which zone begins in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, excluding therefrom the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors located within said zone, as excepted in the treaty with the Republic of Panama dated the 18th day of November, 1903, but including all islands within said described zone and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama named Naos, Perico, Culebra, and Flamenco, and any lands and waters outside of said limits above described which are now necessary or convenient, or from time to time may become necessary or convenient, for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals, lakes, or other works necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said enterprise, the use, occupancy, or control whereof were granted to the United States by the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 26th day of February, 1904, shall be known and designated as the Canal Zone, and the canal to be constructed thereon shall be known and designated as the Panama Canal.

SEC. 2. That, subject to the provisions of this act, all the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States in the Canal Zone are hereby vested in the President of the United States, including the power to make all laws, rules, or regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal, as well as all the rights, powers, and authority granted to the United States by the terms of the treaty described in section 1 of this act.

The power and authority hereby conferred upon the President may be exercised by him through such person or persons as he may designate from time to time, and in such manner as he may direct, for the government of the Canal Zone and the maintenance and protection of the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion, and for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal. All orders and regulations with respect to the government of the Canal Zone heretofore made by the President, or pursuant to his directions and authority, are ratified and confirmed, without prejudice to the power of the President to revoke or amend the same in accordance with the authority granted to him by this act. And the President in his discretion may create and organize a civil and political establishment for the government of the Canal Zone, with power to sue and be sued, and with such other governmental powers as to him may seem necessary and convenient to carry out the purposes of this act; and he may alter, reorganize, abolish, or re-create any such establishment when in his judgment it is necessary to do so.

SEC. 3. That, for the purposes described in this act, the President is authorized to detail, appoint, or employ, or cause to be detailed, appointed, or employed, such person or persons as he may deem necessary from time to time, with such duties, powers, jurisdiction, and official designations as to him may seem proper, and to dismiss or provide for the dismissal of such person or persons; and the compensation of each and all of such persons shall be fixed by the President or by his authority from time to time. Any of the persons appointed and employed as aforesaid may be persons in the military or civil service of the United States, but the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of the salary that may be provided for them under the provisions of this act.

Authority is hereby given to the President, and those acting for him, for the procurement, use, and maintenance of each and everything necessary for the complete construction, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal.

SEC. 4. That from and after such time as the President may designate the powers and authority heretofore conferred upon the Isthmian Canal Commission shall be exercised by such person or persons as may be appointed, detailed, or designated by the President in accordance with the provisions of this act; and thereafter the Isthmian Canal Commission shall cease to exist.

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe charges or tolls for the use of the Panama Canal and to alter and change such charges from time to time. The charges, other than passenger tolls, for the use of the canal may be based upon registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, cargo tonnage, or otherwise, and when based upon registered tonnage shall not exceed $1.50 per net ton, nor be less than 50 cents per net ton, vessels of the United States and vessels of the Republic of Panama excepted. Nor shall any rate of charge be prescribed which is less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of Article XIX of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama entered into November 18, 1903, and the right of the United States to pass its own vessels, troops, materials, merchandise, and supplies without the payment of any charge.

SEC. 6. That the President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims on account of damages resulting from the injury or destruction of vessels or other property when being handled by the United States, its agents, officers, or employees, in passing through any of the canal locks, and such compensation when found to be due shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for the maintenance and operation of the canal. In case of disagreement between the Government authorities and the owners of the property so damaged or destroyed in respect to the validity of the claim or the extent of the same, the claimants may institute suit in the circuit court of the Canal Zone against the Canal Zone Government, and the issues shall be determined therein as in ordinary civil cases; and if a judgment in favor of the claimants is rendered therein, the amount due the claimants thereunder shall be paid to them as herein provided for in the settlement of claims, and no execution shall issue on such judgment.

SEC. 7. That the President is further authorized to establish, maintain, and operate dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary appurtenances and facilities for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies to and other needs of passing vessels, in accordance with appropriations made from time to time by Congress, as a part of the maintenance and operation of the said canal; and the moneys received in the ordinary course from the conduct of such business may be extended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, and monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the person or persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

SEC. 8. That the judicial power in the Canal Zone shall be vested in one circuit court and such inferior courts as the President may constitute. The judge of the circuit court shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of four years and until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall receive a salary of per annum and such other allowances as may be given to officials of his class on the zone. In the event of the absence or incapacity to act of the judge so appointed, a judge pro tempore may be appointed by the President, who shall receive such compensation for his services as the President may prescribe. No person holding a judicial office shall at the same time have executive or legislative power.

The records of existing courts and all causes and proceedings pending therein at the time of the approval of this act, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be transferred to and continued in the new courts herein provided for and authorized, at such time and in such manner as may be provided by order of the President. For the purpose only of enabling the existing supreme court of the Canal Zone to determine finally any causes and proceedings which may be pending therein when this act takes effect, the President may continue the said court in existence and retain the judges thereof in office for such time as may seem to him necessary.

The circuit court of appeals of the fifth circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the circuit court of the Canal Zone, and to render such judgments as in the opinion of the said appellate court should have been rendered by the trial court, in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution, or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved and a right thereunder denied; and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds $1,000, or in which the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $1,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party or by other competent evidence, is involved or brought in question, and also in criminal causes wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony. And such appellate jurisdiction may be exercised by said circuit court of appeals on appeal or writ of error in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure as nearly as practicable as is done in reviewing the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 9. That in all criminal prosecutions in the Canal Zone, involving capital punishment or imprisonment for life, the accused shall enjoy the right of trial by an impartial jury.

SEC. 10. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama, with respect to the Canal Zone, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes, and such purposes only, the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated as an organized territory of the United States.

SEC. 11. That this act shall be known and referred to as the Panama Canal act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now I yield the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that the Senate has been in session a long time and Senators are undoubtedly weary. I would not ordinarily attempt to make a speech at such a time, but this is a question of considerable importance and other matters are pressing hard upon us. I take it that this bill will be laid aside to-night until appropriation measures have been disposed of, and this is my excuse for inflicting myself upon you at this late hour.

It is unnecessary at this time to discuss at length the wisdom or unwisdom of constructing the Panama Canal. No enterprise has ever been undertaken by the United States which has received such universal approval as has the proposition to fulfill Columbus's dream of sailing directly from the Occident to the Orient. Some few may question the means which were employed in securing the right and opportunity for this country to construct this waterway, but no one denies the wisdom or the patriotism of its construction.

The physical canal is practically an accomplished fact. The seemingly almost insuperable obstacles of nature have been overcome; the lofty heads of the Cordilleras which for ages towered above two oceans have, by the mighty hand of American enterprise, been brought low. Uninhabitable marshes and unoccupied valleys and hills have been made the beds of deep lakes which will float the largest ships of the sea. The mosquito breeding, fever-infected zone which afforded a grave to thousands of employees of the French Canal Co. has been made one of the most healthful places on the globe. Indeed, the heretofore impossible has been accomplished, and this country and the world are now contemplating the near-by day when this stupendous work shall be dedicated to the practical uses for which it was constructed.

The canal has been dug through American territory acquired from a foreign country for the very purposes to which it has been applied. Due to treaty relations with Great Britain it was necessary for the United States to do more than acquire the right of way from the Republic of Panama. Said treaty relations were entered into in 1850. They dealt with the possibility of canal construction across the Isthmus by private enterprise and provided for united protection of any canal which might be built. The treaty prohibited fortification by either signatory power and denied to each country the right to secure any special benefits not enjoyed by the other. All attempts at canal construction having failed, it was proposed in 1900 that the United States should undertake the enterprise. It was to do the work, pay all the expense, both of construction and of operation and maintenance. It is possible that the United States could have dug and operated the canal under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if it had been willing unselfishly to have assumed all responsibility, to pay all bills, and then give Great Britain and all other countries demanding the same privileges the right to use the waterway on the same terms as the United States used it; but under that treaty the United States could not fortify property which would cost it $400,000,000; it could not grant any special privileges to its own people. The provisions of the treaty of 1850 rendered canal construction by the United States unwise and impracticable, hence the necessity for abrogating that treaty and the making of a new one.

In 1901 the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into and in express terms it superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, and now, the work of construction being about completed, we have reached the point where a permanent government for the zone and for the operation and maintenance of the canal is an imperative and immediately pressing duty. From the time the United States acquired from the French company the Panama Railroad property and from Panama the 10-mile strip upon which the canal has been constructed the government of that strip and the operation of the enterprise have been controlled by a military form of government under the direction of the President. It seems to be the general opinion of Senators that we should now relieve the President from supreme responsibility and establish by congressional action a formal and complete government, and while I consent to this opinion, I have serious doubts as to the wisdom of changing governmental conditions on the Isthmus until the canal has been put in successful operation by those who have made its construction possible and who know from actual experience what kind of government is suited to existing conditions and what methods of operation are best calculated to its success.

Your committee has given much attention to this subject and has with patient interest listened to men who professed to know much about it, and many of them did know about it, and some of them were more concerned about their own interests than they were about the construction and operation of a canal in the interest of our country.

As to the question of whether the government which we shall establish shall be administered through a governor or a commission of three members the committee was divided; a majority, however, having decided for a commission, it has been so reported. Personally, I am greatly in favor of a single head of canal government. I realize that several men have exerted great influence on the Canal Zone, and I sympathize with those Senators who wish to provide places for these useful men, and under any form of government some of them would be found indispensable and would be retained; but the canal was not undertaken for the purpose of giving men jobs nor for retaining them in positions if their services were no longer needed.

If one lesson has been taught in the canal work which has been more indelibly impressed upon the country than any other, it has been that a commission composed of many members with equal authority is most detrimental to economy, progress, and efficiency. This has been and is a big work, but it is staged in a small area. It is wisely proposed to confine, at least for the present, the canal strip to canal purposes exclusively, and our governmental activities will be limited to the operation of the canal and to the government of those people necessary to its operation. When the canal is completed we will not need a high-priced governor to look after the health conditions of the zone and another high-priced governor to look after civil conditions and still another high-priced governor to look after the operation of the canal and secure its protection. One man such as Col. Goethals should, under the President, be held responsible for all officers on the zone. He would engage such other assistance as would be needful, and there would be no petty jealousies or bickerings, no divided responsibilities. Not until Col. Goethals was given practical control was the greatest progress made and the greatest achievements accomplished, and I am not now pleading for Col. Goethals. When the canal is in operation any one of several men who have rendered great and distinguished service at the Isthmus would be competent and satisfactory to act as governor of this great work. Any one of them would wisely guard the sanitary conditions, the commercial interests, the fortifications, and the canal operations; and he would do it through proper men who would be responsible to him, and for the performance of which duties the United States Government would hold him responsible. In this regard I prefer the provision of the House bill to the Senate amendment.

This Government had two objects in view when it undertook to construct the Panama Canal. One was to benefit commerce, the other was to provide for the national defense, and no rational man supposes that it did not have in contemplation an especial benefit to American commerce, an especial aid to American defense. Great Britain will never claim that we entered upon the construction of this great work on American territory uninspired by a purpose to improve our purse and strengthen our arm. We build the canal; we pay the cost; we protect it against injury; we preserve its neutrality; we secure its sanitation; and we have promised to treat all nations equally, fairly, and equitably. It is evident to me that the nation which undertakes to do these things is exempted from the term "all nations," and we are clearly entitled to charge such tolls upon the foreign tonnage using the canal as we may determine, subject only to the proviso that they are just and equitable, and that no discriminations are permitted.

It is insisted by some distinguished lawyers that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty forbids us to impose tolls upon foreign canal shipping if we permit our coastwise boats to pass through the canal free, but it seems to me there can be no good reason, and I say this respectfully, for at least none has been shown to me, for such belief. Certain it is that no foreign boat can now engage in our coastwise trade—in our interstate commerce—nor could they do so when this treaty was made, and if we now permit our American boats engaged in our coastwise trade and with which no foreign boat is allowed under existing law to compete to pass without charge through the canal, are we discriminating against English or German or other foreign tonnage when we impose tolls upon it? How is the foreigner affected by this alleged discrimination? We are not changing his relations to the American, for we are in this particular case dealing with commerce with which the former has not now nor will he have after the completion of the canal anything to do. This is a purely local matter, and unaffected so far as the foreigner is concerned by the canal. If all of our transcontinental commerce now carried by the railroads was transferred to water carriers through the canal without tolls, would any foreign boat be denied any advantage which it now enjoys, or which it could enjoy through the canal under the existing law as to coastwise traffic, which law it is not proposed to change?

I listened the other day with a great deal of interest to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in his discussion of this proposition, and it seemed to me that either he had a misunderstanding of the conditions or else I was ignorant in reference to them. He contended that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty under which we are now operating forbade the favoring of American commerce using the canal, because of the obligation imposed upon the United States to preserve its neutrality, and in answering my question as to what he meant by "neutrality," I fear, as I have said, that he did not have in mind the conditions at the Isthmus as they existed in 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made, and in 1901, when the last treaty was entered into.

It is needless to discuss in detail the circumstances which in 1850 revived the old desire for a canal. It is sufficient that such a desire was strongly revived at that time. The year before the United States had made a contract with Nicaragua whereby the latter granted to an American company the right to construct a canal via the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua between the two oceans. It should be borne in mind that Great Britain was not favorable to this contract. She claimed an interest in and protectorate over the Mosquito Coast, and insisted that she had rights in Costa Rica and Nicaragua. The United States did not admit these British claims, but nevertheless she had to consider them, and they were influential in causing the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. The possibility of a canal built by private capital through alleged British territory was being considered. Another company was contemplating a waterway via Panama. Under these conditions it was finally agreed that neither Great Britain nor the United States should take or hold or enjoy any benefits in any canal built by private enterprise which the other did not have. Understand that the then pending proposition of a Nicaragua canal was not for one to be built by Great Britain or by the United States, and all the provisions contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty prohibiting the fortification, not of a canal which either country owned but fortifications in the vicinity of the canal, must be taken into consideration in order to determine exactly what the relations were between the United States and England at the time of the making of the treaty of 1850.

The very fact that there was a prohibition in that treaty against fortification by either country of a canal built by private capital shows conclusively to me that the United States was influenced somewhat by the Monroe doctrine, then more in dispute than now. We were insisting that the rights of Great Britain in Central America, in Nicaragua, on the Mosquito coast, and in Costa Rica were at least questionable; we were insisting that England had no right to claim authority there, but she was anxious to preserve her alleged rights in Central America. In 1901 no such conditions existed. The Monroe doctrine was unquestioned, and Great Britain laid no claim to property in Central America. She laid no claim to any right at the Isthmus, where the Nicaragua Canal was to have been built or where the Panama Canal is now being built. Therefore the term "neutralization," as used in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty refers in express terms, applied to war conditions, to conditions upon which the canal could be used by belligerents. Its meaning then was limited, but has been somewhat enlarged, not, however, so as to include conditions of isthmian commerce, except as the same are guaranteed against hostile attack in time of war, and the terms "equality" and "equity" apply to its use in times of peace, to commerce unembarrassed by any conditions of war.

The canal can not be used at this time, I repeat, under authority or permission of the United States by belligerents, either as a rendezvous, a base of supplies, or place of safety. In matters of warfare the canal is to be neutral, and the United States has engaged to keep it so. The treaty of 1901 refers to the general principle of neutrality as established in article 8 of the treaty of 1850, and to that treaty and the circumstances and conditions which caused its creation and surrounded its making must we go for an interpretation of neutrality as used in the Hay-Pauncefote agreement.

In order to understand it, we have to consider the conditions in 1850 and in 1901. But it has seemed to me that the question whether we are included in the term "all nations," when we apply the treaty to our coastwise trade, has been settled by the Supreme Court.

A case reported in the One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, that of Olesen against Smith, is directly in point. That was a case growing out of the pilotage laws enacted by the State of Texas. It appears that Texas had a law which permitted United States boats, and especially boats that were owned in the State of Texas, to come into the harbor of Galveston without a pilot, but imposed a pilotage charge on foreign vessels coming in. It is not necessary to recite all the provisions of that law. It is sufficient to state that they provided that foreign boats should employ pilots. In other words, it was a compulsory pilotage law, but excepted Texas boats from its operation. We have a treaty with Great Britain which states in express terms that—> no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

This boat which came into the harbor in 1904 was a British boat. She refused to take on a pilot, and the pilot, who, under the law, was entitled to his pay, he being the first to offer his services, and having been refused, brought this action in court.

In that case the treaty was pleaded in defense. It was also pleaded that the law affected interstate commerce, and with interstate commerce the State of Texas had nothing to do. The court very properly held on this point, as we all know it must have held, that inasmuch as the Federal Government had not acted, the State of Texas could exercise that right and it had constitutionally exercised it. But in reference to the defense that the Texas law was in violation of the harbor treaty with Great Britain, the court held it was not in such violation, although the terms of the treaty were more clear and specific than the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In rendering its opinion on this point of that case the court said:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."
> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

That is the interpretation which the Supreme Court of the United States has placed upon a similar treaty, holding that, inasmuch as our coastwise trade can not be participated in by a foreign boat, therefore any regulation which we may see fit to make touching that trade can not possibly be a discrimination against a foreign boat.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am in entire agreement with the Senator from Michigan with respect to the proper construction of the treaty. I believe, and presently will try to show from my standpoint, that we have a right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of our shipping. Nevertheless I can not put my conclusion upon the opinion of the Supreme Court which the Senator has just read, and I want to suggest to him what I believe to be a distinction.

The Supreme Court in the case just cited decided it upon the assumption that the traffic was not competitive; that the coastwise business along the shores of Texas did not compete with the foreign business carried on by the British vessel.

That is not true of the Panama Canal in reference to its coastwise business. While no British ship can engage in the coastwise business, the British ship is nevertheless in competition with the American ship in business on the coasts of America. For instance, suppose an American ship should leave New York, filled with steel rails, destined for San Francisco, the market being in San Francisco. At the same time a British ships leaves Liverpool, filled with steel rails, also destined for San Francisco. These two ships and their cargoes are in competition with each other. The price at which the cargoes can be sold in the market, it being a common market, depends to some extent upon the charge made for its passage through the Panama Canal. The instance I cite could be indefinitely extended.

So I can easily conceive that if a case under the treaty of 1901 ever reaches the Supreme Court of the United States it could readily make the distinction I have suggested between such a case and the one decided in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States.

I submit this to the Senator from Michigan for such consideration as it may deserve.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I myself have considered that point, and yet I can see no distinction in principle between the court case I have cited and the case made by the Senator from Iowa. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to it.

The pilotage charge is also a charge upon commerce. Suppose, in the case cited here, it had been a cargo of rails, such as the Senator suggested, from New York to Galveston. Suppose at the same time a cargo of rails went from England to Galveston, and in one case—that of the American boat—it was not charged with tolls, but the English boat was. It is a burden upon the traffic to charge for pilotage the same as it would be to impose tolls.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that. I believe if a case such as has been suggested had been the case before the Supreme Court and that point had been made under the evidence in the case, the decision would have been precisely as I think it must be if the two cargoes are passed through the Panama Canal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can see no difference in the two cases. I do not know whether the point made by the Senator was raised in the Texas case or not. I do know that there was a case that was decided under a provision very similar to the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, one prohibiting any discrimination, and I do know that England apparently acquiesced in our courts decision.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not make any distinction between the treaty under which the case was decided and the treaty that we are now considering, because I think in substance they are the same.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are the same in so far as this point is concerned. They are not the same, in my judgment, in so far as the subject matter covered by them is concerned. But the point was not made in the case. The court considered it apparently upon the hypothesis that there was no discrimination, because there was no competition and could be no competition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course it was based purely upon the theory that no American goods, no American commerce, could be carried in the coastwise trade or from port to port in foreign bottoms under our coastwise laws.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I hesitate to interfere with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator need not hesitate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it has been suggested to me that it is desirable to hold an executive session this afternoon. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has asked me if it would be agreeable to the Senator to conclude his remarks to-morrow afternoon, so that the Post Office Committee may have a meeting and report out the appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senate will indulge me, I will be through in a very few minutes. I would rather finish to-night. I want to accommodate the Senate, but I can finish very soon if there are no interruptions, and I will not invite interruptions.

Some Senators who readily admit that we have the right under the treaty of 1901 to remit tolls on our coastwise shipping passing through the canal, do not believe that we have the right to pass free of tolls boats of American registry engaged in trade between the United States and a foreign country, and I can see better grounds for this belief than in the case of our domestic shipping. But if my heretofore expressed opinion that "all nations," as used in article 3 of the treaty, excludes the United States, which is the owning, constructing, operating Nation—the Nation which provides the rules, and hence is responsible for the canal and its operation—then certainly we have the right to retain a benefit which common sense and common justice would warrant.

But the same gentlemen who would deny us the right to pass our merchantmen through the canal free of tolls insist that we can pass our warships through without charge. They contend that to admit the former under the treaty we would have to interpolate words and meaning which the letter of the treaty does not contain, but the same is equally true as to vessels of war. Gentlemen will use reason in interpreting the provision as to war vessels, but refuse to apply it in the case of vessels of commerce, although these two classes of ships are found in the same paragraph of the treaty, joined by the conjunction "and."

It is generally admitted that nearly every foreign nation grants a subsidy to its boat lines engaged in foreign commerce, and it has been reported that some of the foreign countries are already making legal provision for paying to ships passing through the canal whatever tolls may have been paid to the United States. Will anyone contend that our Government could not do the same things to American boats? If this could be done indirectly by repayment, will it be contended that it can not be done directly?

But a majority of the committee, having in mind the desirability of building up our merchant marine, and wishing to satisfy, as far as possible, the objections of Senators who do not read the treaty as some of us do, has inserted in the bill a provision that the American boat engaged in the foreign trade in order to receive free passage through the canal must enter into a contract to the effect that in case of war or other emergency such vessel may be appropriated and used by the United States. Under the clear and undisputed terms of the treaty this proposed condition would constitute a class of boats which could be passed without tolls, and no discrimination would be practiced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope it will not be a long one.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the United States were to pay tolls for its warships to whom would the United States make the payment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. To the United States, of course. And to whom would the United States pay back the rebate or refund?

Mr. McCUMBER. Would that be a payment—the United States paying it to itself?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It seems to have been so argued; and some distinguished Senators argue with a good deal of reason that the Government can collect the tolls and then repay them and by so doing can keep within the letter and spirit of the treaty. No; I do not think that we should pay tolls on our battleships, nor do I believe that a true interpretation of the treaty contemplated it, neither do I believe it was contemplated when that treaty was made that our merchantmen should be compelled to pay tolls if our Government saw fit to exempt them.

I desire to offer every proper encouragement to the building and operating of American ships, and free tolls would, I believe, contribute materially to this end.

Section 11 of the proposed bill deals with the class or ownership of vessels which may be operated through the canal. I have already stated that one of the objects for constructing the canal was to aid commerce—our commerce. It may accomplish this purpose by furnishing additional facilities for transportation. Certain traffic will naturally seek the water and by so doing will relieve congested railroad traffic and permit greater expedition and better facilities for that character of traffic which almost of necessity must be carried by the railroads.

Water transportation, if kept free and unmonopolized, will reduce rail rates and keep them reasonable, and this will be true not only at points where rail and water are directly competitive, but it will affect rates in the somewhat remote interior. I shall not attempt to cite cases and quote rates proving this proposition, but shall content myself by saying that water competition, active or potential, affects rail rates directly for more than a hundred miles from the water, and when the canal is completed self-preservation will compel the rail carriers to reduce their rates to all interior points. Where free and sufficient water transportation facilities exist direct and indirect competing rail transportation is reasonable. We need no commerce commission to keep railroad rates reasonable where water competition exists. The water carrier is the best and most effective rail-rate regulator. The great question therefore is how to operate the canal so as to secure the greatest competition, not only between boats operating through it, but with rail carriers as well.

I think I can undersand why transcontinental railroads have been unfriendly to the construction of the Panama Canal. It will in a measure interfere with their carrying monopoly. It will compel them to compete with water carriers unless they can directly or indirectly control the waterway. It will compel them to improve their carrying facilities or to reduce their rates, and probably it will do both. Naturally one would think that a railroad company would not care to own a boat line competing with itself. It does not seem reasonable that it would buy a boat and use it to lessen its own business; and it would not. Its object may be consistent with greater and cheaper transportation facilities, but it is difficult for me to understand how.

This is a new highway, and we have now an opportunity to start it free from the possibilities of railroad domination. It will be more difficult to expel railroad boats from the canal when they are once lawfully there than it is to keep them from entering at all.

The legitimate field for railroad operation is wide and it should not be permitted to participate in our coastwise traffic. So far as our internal affairs are concerned it would be well to confine our common carriers strictly and exclusively to transportation—the railroads on the land, the boats on the water. They never ought to have been permitted to engage in any kind of business other than that for which they were chartered, and no charter should have been granted for any other purpose than that of transportation.

This principle generally applied would affect lines already established and great disturbance to business without adequate compensation might result from the divorcement of water and rail carriers now, but so far as the canal is concerned—and that is the business we have in hand—there are no existing complications, and we have a splendid opportunity to demonstrate the effect of water transportation unaffected by railroad influence. The demonstration will be worth while, and if it proves what I expect it will, there will be time enough to make its application general.

I would not be understood as condemning the ownership of a boat line by a railroad where the former is but an extension of the rails of the latter across the water, and so any railroad which desires to engage in the foreign trade through the canal should be encouraged to do so.

I realize that much of what I have said thus far in reference to section 11 has been largely academic and void of demonstrated argument, but the transportation problem is familiar to all. The tendency of large carriers to destroy small ones has been a part of our national history. Monopoly is easily possible to the strong railroad, and where no legal restraints exist that condition is almost always realized, and whatever may be our policy hereafter we have not yet abandoned all hope for water competition, and that, notwithstanding the disappointing condition of railroad competition. Indeed, it is known that we have no real railroad competition now, so far as rates are concerned, nor have we had since the Interstate Commerce Commission began to fix rates. On the water it is different, at least so far as coastwise traffic is concerned. Anyone with sufficient capital can build and operate a boat and he may carry for what he pleases; he may charge nothing, if he chooses. Every independent boat line, every tramp steamer, is a factor in keeping rates reasonable.

The railroad-owned boat engaged in the coastwise trade and plying between our east and west coasts through the canal would have an advantage over any independent boat in that it would be backed by the capital and influence of the railroad, and that influence would naturally be exerted for its owner, the railroad. It would be for the railroad's interest to increase its earnings, and this could not be done if its traffic was diverted for any great length of time to the water carrier. A boat owned by the railroad and engaged primarily in the foreign trade could, so far as its owners were concerned, carry coastwise traffic at less than cost if by so doing it could lessen the number of water competitors, for eventually these owners would regain whatever they had temporarily lost; but if at this time we serve notice upon the prospective shipowners of the United States that we propose to give the railroads and the capital back of them the right to enter the canal on equal terms with all others, we may be quite sure that the railroads will not need to establish unprofitable rates, for no independent boats will be built; no competitors will appear.

I know of but one line of railroad-owned boats now in existence which would use the canal in coastwise trade if permitted to do so. It is an undoubtedly profitable and useful line and it can continue in the same business which it now follows. Its capable manager—for whom I have great respect for his ability and for his evident fairness—says he does not care to engage in the coastwise trade except incidentally in connection with his foreign business; that he desires to build four large ships, to be splendidly equipped, but that he can not obtain the money with which to build these ships if this incident of interstate traffic is denied him. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate capitalistic railroad domination of the means to adequate transportation than this admission, and I as a representative of the American people feel that it is my duty to prevent as far as within me lies this grip of monopoly upon a waterway which has cost the country so much and for which its expectations are so great. We may lose the opportunity for securing these four large boats, but we will, I believe, obtain many times four boats from nonrailroad sources.

At the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to the bill providing that any American boat of whatever ownership may engage in that part of our coastwise traffic, which can be carried on between continental United States and our insular possessions or dependencies—between the United States and Hawaii or the Philippines or Porto Rico. The reason for excluding railroad-owned boats from participating in the coastwise trade of the United States proper do not seem to me to apply to traffic between the United States and these islands or to that between the islands themselves. Those boats which do or can compete with the railroads should not be owned by those railroads.

The bill provides that a railroad-owned boat engaged in the foreign trade may do a coastwise trade en route to and from the foreign country, providing that not less than 50 per cent of its traffic is destined to or from the foreign country, but that is not a good or practical provision. No possible harm can come to any existing line from the prohibition which I propose. No property will be confiscated. No vested right will be disturbed. Any man or company, excepting a railroad company, can embark in the steamboat business through the canal, and I have heard of but one railroad company which proposed to operate a boat line through the new waterway. Is it not the part of wisdom, in view of our past experience, to keep this great new enterprise free from railroad influence until at least it shall have been demonstrated that independent boats will not be furnished in sufficient tonnage to meet the demands of traffic?

I shall not be surprised if less tonnage passes through the canal than is now predicted, and yet its construction will be amply justified, especially if monopoly is not permitted. I expect to see better facilities furnished, more tracks laid, quicker time made, and lower rates charged by the railroads. Such has been our history in similar cases, and it makes no difference to the people whether the canal shall furnish better and cheaper transportation by its actual use, or whether its influence upon the rail carriers shall bring to pass the same results over the railroad. It is satisfactory transportation rates and facilities we have in mind as one of the two great objects for building the canal. But if by any means the roads can control the water, then we may be sure that this great expenditure of money for building and operating the canal will have been squandered, so far as benefits to commerce are concerned. Surely it is best to take no chances in a matter of such mighty importance to the country.

I have no doubt that it will be urged here that we can direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates and regulations which railroad-owned boats may charge and under which they may operate through the canal, but I am opposed to that; first, because the commission has more than it can do well now and, second, because water competition will cease when Government rate fixing begins. It is possible that we will some day reach the time when boats will be treated as railroads are, so far as prescribing rates and regulations are concerned, but that time is not yet, and in the meanwhile let us see what can be accomplished by competition uninfluenced by monopoly.

What I said at the beginning in reference to tolls was general and applied to all nations, but permit me to advert briefly to the special case of Canada. It is urged that if the toll gates swing free to United States boats, but will open to Canadian boats only upon the payment of tolls, that the Dominion will retaliate at the Canadian Soo, the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals. I can not so believe, and I would not violate either the letter or the spirit of our treaty relations with our neighbor on the north, although her present administration seems actuated by something less than the truest feelings of amity and good will toward us. Our existing treaty with Canada gives that country no right to participate in our coastwise traffic. It does provide, however, that both nations can on equal terms use the Canadian and American Soo locks and canals; the American St. Clair Canal, the Detroit River artificial channel, the Welland and the St. Lawrence Canals. The benefits to the two countries are mutual. There is actual and real reciprocity in this treaty, and no benefits from any other sources than those inhering in the mutual use of the Great Lakes, the Welland Canal, and the St. Lawrence River, were contemplated.

It is true that until our new Soo lock, which is in process of construction, is completed, lake traffic would be retarded if we were denied the use of the Canadian Soo locks for some of our large boats, but our treaty with the Dominion will not have terminated before our new lock will be done and Canada will have no just cause to abrogate the treaty if we live up to our part of the contract, and we will. We will be just to all nations, and in this instance "all" will include our own.

I want the time to come when there shall be no tollgates on land or lake or sea in the way of commerce between Canada and the United States; but that time will come, if it ever comes, when the two countries, without dissembling, but in truth and sincerity, shall ask and receive genuine reciprocity in all matters pertaining to trade and commerce. In the meanwhile, without disturbing the status quo of our treaty or traffic relations with Canada, we should proceed, as she and all other nations would do under similar circumstances, viz, to promote the general welfare of our own people.

It is possible that free passage of American-owned boats will not inure to the benefit of the people, and I confess that if the effect was simply upon the cargoes in the ships thus passed through the canal I should be inclined to believe that the shipowner would be the sole beneficiary of our bounty, but the effect will not be so circumscribed. Free ships will have a tendency to encourage the building and operating of more ships, and this result will, through competition, have a tendency to materially reduce rates to such an extent that the consignee—the consumer—will get the benefit. But the boat rates must be met by the rail rates. This fact has been made eloquent by every act of the railroad companies since the canal project was started. It is because of this fact that railroad managers want a controlling hand in canal affairs. They know that this completed enterprise will be more potent in reducing rates and in furnishing adequate facilities than all the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the decrees of the courts. We may not be able to balance all influences and segregate those which are properly due to the canal, but we may be sure that the lower rail rates will inure to the benefit of the people, as they should, because it was their genius which conceived this enterprise, it was their money and energy which constructed it, and it will be their patriotism which will maintain and operate it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 18, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Creator, Father soul, to whom we are indebted for all things, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy blessings unto us as individuals and as a Nation, that we may think clearly, act wisely, do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God, remembering that "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." And Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a memorandum on the jurisdiction of courts with respect to the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, by John B. Daish.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a paper written by John B. Daish on some phase of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a personal request, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 16, 1912.

THE SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, United States.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I desire to have leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

Very truly, yours, THOMAS PARRAN.

The SPEAKER. That request ought to be dated back two days. The letter came to the Speaker, and in the multiplicity of letters that come it got misplaced in some way. The Chair does not want to do the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PARRAN] an injustice. Without objection, the leave of absence is granted and is dated back to the 16th, covering these roll calls that were had on Tuesday and yesterday.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence until August 7, on account of important business.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

ELECTION OF SERGEANT AT ARMS.

Mr. CULLOP and Mr. HEFLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the gentleman proceeds, I would like to report to the House that a caucus was held yesterday, and Mr. Charles F. Riddell was unanimously chosen as Sergeant at Arms, to fill out the unexpired term of Mr. U. Stokes Jackson. Mr. Speaker, I move his election at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there another nomination? If not, the question is on the election of Charles F. Riddell as Sergeant at Arms, to fill the unexpired term of the Hon. U. S. Jackson, deceased.

The question was taken, and Mr. Riddell was elected.

Mr. Riddell appeared before the bar of the House, and the oath of office was administered to him by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 20728. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 24, providing for an inquiry as to the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello, Va.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 338) authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Colville Indian Reservation to the town of Okanogan, State of Washington, for public-park purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 5446. An act relating to partial assignments of desert-land entries within reclamation projects made since March 28, 1908;

S. 6934. An act to provide an extension of time for submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation; and

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate concurrent resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. Con. Res. 24. Providing for an inquiry as to the purchase of the home of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, Va.; to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, Fourth of July orators tell us that there are no classes in America, that in this country "men are born free and equal," and that the Declaration of Independence says so. And there are still some persons in this country who believe that this being a Republic there are no classes.

ARE THERE CLASSES IN AMERICA?

It is true that interesting historical document, the Declaration of Independence, says that "all men are born free and equal." But that was not so, even at the time when the sentence was written. It is less so now.

Men are not born equal. They do not live as equals. They do not die as equals.

The child of the rich is surrounded by comforts and luxury, even before it is born. It is raised with tender care. Danger and sickness are kept away from it. It has every advantage that our civilization affords. Unless killed by an accident or by yielding to the temptations which wealth afford, these children of fortune grow up to a ripe old age, honored and respected by everybody and especially their children, who expect to inherit their wealth and their privileges.

How about the child of the poor? It is born in want and misery which had their beginning long before the child was born. More than half of the poor die before they are a year old. The child that survives and grows up to manhood or womanhood leads a life of toil and misery, filled with temptations of all kinds, which often lead to crime and prostitution. Old age means beggary or the poorhouse—at best, the aged poor are a great burden to their children. Many prefer an early grave.

Now, where is the equality of birth? Or during life, or even at the deathbed?

And do we have classes in America?

IS THERE EQUALITY BEFORE THE LAW?

We are told, however, that equality in the Declaration of Independence means equality before the law.

I fail to see it there, either.

There is equality before the law when both parties are rich or both parties are poor. There is no equality in the case of a poor person against a rich person or against a wealthy corporation. Rich people will have the best lawyers, while a poor man may, if he has a good case, get a pettifogger on a half share.

Let us watch a common police court on any day. Two men—one looking prosperous, the other looking poor—are arrested for a similar offense. Each is fined $10 and costs. The prosperous man will put down his $10 and walk out smilingly. The other man can not pay and is sent up to the house of correction. Now, it is clear to any observer that the poor fellow is deprived of his liberty, not on account of his misdemeanor but because he did not have $10.

MOST ALL LEGISLATION IS CLASS LEGISLATION.

Do we have classes in America?

Supposing a man out of work is picked up in some alley or under some bridge. He was trying to spend the night there, because he does not have the money for a night's lodging. The next morning he is fined and deprived of his liberty as a vagrant, because he did not have any money to pay for a lodging. In other words, in our country it is a crime to be without money.

We not only have classes, but most all of our legislation is class legislation—by the ruling class or its agents.

We have a plutocracy—we are ruled by the wealthy class.

CLASS STRUGGLE IS AS OLD AS CIVILIZATION.

The existence of classes is nothing new, of course. The class struggle is many thousand years old. It began with civilization. It is therefore foolish to accuse the Socialists that they are trying to "create classes"—that we incite class antagonism and class hatred.

We want to abolish classes, class antagonism, and class hatred.

If in former centuries, however, the working class meekly submitted to oppression and deprivation, there was some reason for it. There were not enough of the world's goods to go around to suffice for everybody. Naturally, therefore, the stronger took the first choice for themselves and their kin, and the people got the leavings, if there were any.

The economic basis has changed.

NO ECONOMIC REASON FOR THE EXISTENCE OF CLASSES HAS DISAPPEARED.

We have secured control over the forces of nature to such a degree as to bring the possibilities of comfort and well-doing within the reach of everybody, at least in civilized countries. With the present machinery of production it is within the power of society to supply all the reasonable wants of every man, woman, and child living.

And if there should not be enough of any product, we could easily multiply it infinitely, provided every man would do his reasonable share of work; and, provided also, that society would apply all the machinery at its disposal.

Then we could all have plenty. And the work time of every worker could be shortened considerably. In all probability it need not be half of what it is now.

In order to accomplish this, however, the working class must have its own representation. The proletarians of America must have a political party of their own to give expression to their own needs and wants, just as the working class of every other civilized country has its own political party.

CAN NOT HONESTLY REPRESENT MORE THAN ONE CLASS.

The working class has nothing to hope for from either the Republican Party or the Democratic Party. The representatives of these parties may be, and very often are, very cultured and accomplished gentlemen. Most of them are personally honest. However, they represent the capitalist system; and the more honest and consistent they are the more loyal they are to their class.

And the two parties may fight about the spoils of this system, but neither of them is willing to change the economic basis of the present society.

It is, therefore, only natural that every law passed by the Republican or Democratic Parties benefits the capitalist class, or some group of it, in some manner—even laws that obviously seem to favor the workers, like the workmen's compensation act.

WHAT THE TWO OLD PARTIES REPRESENT.

Political parties are simply the expressions of economic interests.

The Republican Party is the favorite organization of the big capitalists. Why? Because it stood for a great deal of "business" during the late Civil War, and because, by its high-tariff proclivities and its banking laws, it has given a strong impetus to the profits of the manufacturers and bankers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For a generation it was considered the conservative business man's party of the country.

The Democratic Party, in its great majority, stood for the economic and political interests of the slave owners before the Civil War. After the war it naturally has become the dominant party of the South, where the former slave owner is slowly getting to be a manufacturer, a banker, or a capitalist. Up North the Democratic Party, not having any great economic interests to express, soon fell into the hands of corrupt machines, at least in the large cities. Thus we have Tammany in New York, the Cook County Democracy in Chicago, the Rose Democracy in Milwaukee, and other benevolent graft institutions. It naturally also became the favorite organization of the liquor interests in the Northern States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The capitalist class, therefore, is just as willing to deal with the Democratic Party as with the Republican Party. While the latter is conservative, the Democratic Party is, to all intents and purposes, reactionary, especially on the industrial field; it would like to go back to the days before the war. Being behind the time in most things, it is especially ignorant and brutal in regard to the labor question, as the laws of many Southern States prove.

WHY THEY "DEARLY LOVE THE WORKINGMAN."

However, the workingmen of this country have votes, and that is the reason why the Democrats have in recent years discovered that they "dearly love the workingman." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

That is the reason why we have passed a few labor laws in this House. Of course, these laws have not passed the Senate nor the scrutiny of the Supreme Court; however, they will do in that form as campaign food on the eve of a presidential election.

Of course none of these laws will add a single sandwich to the daily fare of the many millions of workingmen and working women. None of these laws will take care of the old invalids of industry or help along the young. Every civilized country on the globe has done a great deal in that direction of late.

Not we. Nowhere is human life as cheap as in America.

KILL MORE WORKMEN EACH YEAR THAN SOLDIERS IN ANY YEAR OF THE CIVIL WAR.

That most of this waste of human life is wholly unnecessary is shown by Dr. John Randolph Haynes, special commissioner on mining accidents of the State of California, in a paper which was originally read before a joint session of the American Association for Labor Legislation and the American Economic Association on December 30, 1911, and is now printed as a Senate document.

Dr. Haynes says that 35,000 workmen are annually slain in the United States while engaged in their daily occupations, and that, if the wounded and crippled in industry are added, Mr. Mercer, of the Minnesota Employers' Compensation Commission, was not far wrong when he claimed that industry in our country now kills and cripples more each year than did bullet and shrapnel in any year of the Civil War.

Coal mining, according to Dr. Haynes, is the most hazardous of all American industries, killing outright from 3,000 to 5,000 and killing and seriously injuring from 8,000 to 10,000 each year. The United States kill more coal miners than all the rest of the world combined.

The following table shows the casualties of employees on American railroads in comparison with those of other countries. The figures are for yearly accidents, based on five-year averages, from 1905 to 1909, inclusive. The table is taken from a statement made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] and appears in Senate Document No. 90 of the Sixty-second Congress:

	Number of employees to 1 killed.	Number of employees to 1 injured.
1. United States	421	19
2. Germany	1,016	431
3. France	1,068	517
4. Switzerland	1,071	26
5. United Kingdom	1,351	134
6. Norway	2,125	340
7. Austria	2,205	160

However, as long as cheap trades for votes can be made with so-called "union labor leaders"—giving the working class nothing, and promising twice as much for next year—both the Democratic and the Republican Parties believe themselves safe.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman the statistics at hand to show how many more railroad employees there are in this country than in the other countries he mentions?

Mr. BERGER. I have none at hand, but if I had them that would not change the result any, because the statistics I quote give the proportion of the number of killed or maimed to the total number employed, and that proportion remains the same, no matter how many there are.

"A DIFFERENCE WITHOUT A DISTINCTION."

The only trouble just now is to make the workmen believe that the Democrats are different from the Republicans.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BERGER. After I have developed my theme, I will yield with pleasure. I say the two old parties are so much alike that they are hard up for an issue.

Mr. GARNER. How about the "bull moose" party?

Mr. BERGER. I shall make a few remarks about that species also, if the gentleman will give me time. [Laughter.]

Of course there is still that old stand-by—the tariff—God be thanked. And Mr. Woodrow Wilson, being a profound man—a man of the type of that other profound gentleman, Grover Cleveland—has declared that the tariff is to be the issue.

But how is it to be done this time?

The Republicans declared themselves to be in favor of a "downward revision." The Democrats are in favor of a "tariff for revenue," but they cautiously add in their platform that they do not want to harm any industry.

Now what does that mean?

If it means anything at all it means that the Democrats do not want to harm any owners of factories, because the South is waking up industrially. The South is beginning to have numberless "infant industries" that want protection. The Democratic Party must take care of these infants.

WILL PROF. WILSON NOW MAKE HIS OWN PLATFORM?

In other words, while Andrew Carnegie and Judge Gary and other northern trust magnates are willing to give up the protective tariff because their Pittsburgh and Chicago infants have grown up to some size—thank you—and they are well able to take care of themselves even in England or Germany, the southern manufacturers are beginning to demand a protective tariff—on cotton products first, of course.

That is natural enough—the South is just about 50 years behind the rest of the country in economic development.

But since that is the case, how is the good professor expecting to make good on the tariff as an issue in the coming election? Is he going to have a platform of his own—a platform other than was adopted in Baltimore, and for which the "peerless leader" stood sponsor?

Mr. Wilson will have to do so if he wants a demarcation of some kind between the old parties. As it is, the names of the two parties could be exchanged in both platforms and nobody would notice the difference.

HOW THE MIGHTY BRYAN HAS FALLEN!

Nothing is left of the great anticapitalist war cry for which Bryan was so well known in 1896. One can readily see that Mr. Bryan of 1912 is a different man—he got to be quite a capitalist himself, and that fact unconsciously changed his point of view.

The 16 to 1 silver issue has been dropped, and that is sensible enough. But nothing is said about nationalization of railroads, either—and the Federal judiciary is not even mentioned.

And what is even more remarkable for a "progressive platform," we can not find a word about direct legislation.

The initiative and referendum and the imperative mandate were conveniently shelved as "State issues," although the national platform is unquestionably the place to enunciate the national principles of a party.

EVERYTHING SHELVED THAT LOOKED "PROGRESSIVE."

And queerly enough even the recall of the judiciary is forgotten—a question that has been agitated very much of late and for which the Democrats in Congress have stood like heroes when they wanted to put "Taft into a hole" on the question of admitting Arizona and New Mexico to statehood. [Applause.]

It may be that Mr. Bryan expected to be a candidate himself and he wanted all the votes in sight, including the dissatisfied conservatives. Otherwise these omissions are hard to explain for a "progressive" platform.

MIGHT VOTE WITH EYES SHUT.

One might say, however, the platforms of the old parties are seldom read and even more seldom carried out. The main thing, then, is the personnel of the candidates.

But just at that point there is really no difference if one is to vote an old-party ticket. One might just as well shut his eyes and vote. The result would be absolutely the same.

ALL THREE ENJOY THE SUPPORT OF THE TRUSTS AND THE BOSSES

All of the candidates are honest men personally, as the term is understood in business and society nowadays. None of the candidates has ever been accused of any wrong other than "stealing convention delegates"—willing and ready to be stolen.

Mr. Roosevelt, who wants to start a party on the issue "Thou shalt not steal" and on business principles, should know that political graft is the very application of business principles to politics.

Furthermore, he also has openly been accused in the Senate of trying to buy delegates both this year and in 1904.

Moreover, the three candidates of the two old parties all enjoy the support of the trusts, the bosses, and the political machines.

HAIL TO GROVER CLEVELAND II!

Mr. Wilson, the Democratic candidate, has probably more support of that kind than any of the rest. Although a so-called progressive, he has with him Boss Murphy, of Tammany; Boss Smith, of New Jersey; Boss Sullivan, of Illinois; and Boss Taggart, of Indiana; their machines, and what they stand for. He was also jubilantly hailed by the reactionary capitalist element of both parties as a "second Grover Cleveland," and was warmly indorsed by every reactionary paper. Belmont and Ryan are his warmest supporters. Wilson's election will not only perpetuate the power of the bosses and their machines, but also inaugurate another era of reaction and "high finance" as we had under Grover Cleveland.

Mr. Wilson looks like a strong candidate owing to the fact that the country is restive and eager for a change, because the average voter foolishly believes that it is within the power of the administration to make good times or bad times at will, and almost everybody is dissatisfied. The evils and shortcomings of the social fabric and of the present economic system are laid at the doors of the administration that happens to be in power. This desire of the average citizen for a change is in favor of Mr. Wilson.

MR. WILSON HAS A "PAST"!

On the other hand, Mr. Wilson is very much handicapped by his past. Mr. Wilson has written books, and, being a recent convert to the cause of progressivism, his works stand out against him. Mr. Wilson has not only attacked the south European and Slavonic immigration, but he has also denounced organized labor.

He once declared that he preferred a Chinese coolie to an American trade-union man, because the former were more law-abiding and more industrious and worked cheaper—or words to that effect. As recently as 1909 he denounced union labor as "unprofitable labor." Mr. Wilson may have changed his mind, but he will have to explain, and the candidate that must explain is in a very poor position. His behavior during the late strikes in New Jersey will also require explanation.

MR. TAFT HAS MOST ALWAYS BEEN AN APPOINTEE.

It is unnecessary to tell where Mr. Taft stands. It is as natural for a man of his type to be allied with men like ROOT, CRANE, GUGGENHEIM, and Hammond as it is for a duck to take to the water. Until Mr. Taft ran for the office of President he had never gone to the common people for any indorsement. He is the son of a former Attorney General and minister to Austria. He was appointed assistant corporation attorney of Cincinnati, appointed a Federal judge, appointed a commissioner to the Philippine Islands, appointed a Secretary of War, and finally appointed the "heir of my policies" by Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. Taft knows the history of the Republican Party as the favorite organization of the big capitalists. And he wants that party to remain the favorite.

EVOLUTION OF REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Moreover, the Republican Party has no other reason for existence than to serve capitalism. It has accomplished one great historical fact—it has freed the negro. That was done, not for humanitarian reasons, but because chattel slavery was incompatible with modern capitalism.

Modern capitalism rests upon wage labor. The Democratic Party of 1860 failed to understand this simple fact—and that is the reason why the Republican Party was founded and grew up to be just what it is now.

It was the party of William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Abraham Lincoln. And it became just as naturally the party of John Sherman, Senator Aldrich, and Richard Ballinger.

That Mr. Taft has the support of many big political bosses and capitalist exploiters goes without further explanation.

WHERE MR. ROOSEVELT STANDS.

The opposition in the Republican Party is represented by the ex-President, Theodore Roosevelt. Where Mr. Roosevelt stands on all the great questions of the day nobody seems to know. I doubt whether Mr. Roosevelt knows himself, because with his brilliant but very erratic mind Mr. Roosevelt may revise and change all of his principles and convictions by to-morrow afternoon. [Laughter and applause.]

At this time it does not appear that he will play much of a part if he does, unless he is satisfied to be the pathfinder of a new organization which is on its way to nowhere in particular.

ROBIN HOOD "PROGRESSIVES."

But a glance at some of the "honest progressives" who are now setting out to purify politics will at once demonstrate that Robin Hood's famous assemblages of outlaws had nothing on the company that are now rallying around Theodore Roosevelt.

There is, for instance, little Tim Woodruff, veteran of the famous "Old Guard" of Albany in bygone days, and such a doubtful asset generally that two years ago Mr. Roosevelt ousted him from the position of a State chairman of New York.

Then there is Boss Flinn, of Pittsburgh, a reactionary from head to heel, soaked and saturated in the municipal corruption of that smoky inferno.

And Lucius Littauer, of Gloversville, N. Y., a reactionary to the backbone; mixed up in post office several years back.

And George W. Perkins, of Morgan and the Steel Trust.

Furthermore, Medill McCormick, of the Harvester Trust and the Chicago Tribune. Comment is really superfluous. [Applause.]

In short, all three candidates are well supported by the organization of their class.

THE TARIFF AND LABOR.

As to the tariff issue as such, this issue is to the working class exactly what every other capitalist issue is. The workingmen are interested in the tariff—as the tariff is now—as consumers only.

The tariff does not protect labor; at the same time any sudden change would be disastrous. It is mainly a manufacturer's issue—until labor really gets its share of the protection.

The tariff is not responsible for the trusts; there are trusts in England, where they have free trade. Moreover, the trusts are now in favor of free trade.

THE REAL ISSUE FOR THE WORKING CLASS.

With us the great issue is the difference between what a workingman in this country produces on the average and what he gets.

It is a class issue; it is the great issue of the working class. In 1909, in the 268,000 factories of this Nation, 6,600,000 wage earners added $1,290 apiece for every worker employed.

Did those workers receive the value they put into the product? Not at all. They received $518 apiece.

The other $772 went to the employers and landowners. This surplus value went to the capitalist class as such—to the landowners, the bankers, and employers, and the holders of special privileges of some sort or another.

Wherever this surplus value goes it goes to some individuals or groups of the capitalist class in some form—either as profit, rent, interest, insurance, and so forth.

ONE REASON FOR THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

In 1909 the number of factory wage earners was 6,615,046, an increase of 21 per cent in 5 years and of 40.4 per cent in 10 years. Women have constituted exactly 19.5 per cent of the factory population in each of the three last censuses. Children constituted 2.5 per cent.

Wage earners do not increase relatively in anything like the proportion that salaried employees do. The gain of the former in 10 years has been 40.4 per cent; of the latter 117 per cent.

It is true of all highly developed countries that the number of persons employed to handle, sell, and promote the sale of commodities increases far more rapidly than the number of persons who make things. This will help to explain the rise in the cost of living.

The number of wage earners does not increase proportionately with the increase of capital.

INCREASE OF OFFICE POPULATION.

Capital has increased 45.4 per cent in 5 years and 105.3 per cent in 10 years. Big capital now controls industry, and the figures are truly amazing.

In 1904 nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the establishments turned out 38 per cent of the product, and in 1909 1.1 per cent turned out 43.8 per cent of the product. Each of these establishments produced values in excess of $1,000,000, and there were 1,900 of them in 1904 and 3,061 in 1909.

Counting the establishments producing more than $100,000 in values annually, it is shown that in 1904 11.2 per cent of the total of 216,180 establishments turned out 79.3 per cent of the total product, and that in 1909 11.5 per cent of the total of 268,491 establishments turned out 82.2 per cent of the total.

The other 88.5 per cent of the establishments had to be satisfied with the leavings of 17.8 per cent of the product.

The average salary drawn in 1899 was $1,046; in 1909, $1,187. These salaries are not classified in this report, as similar salaries are classified in the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is therefore impossible to tell just what rank of employees drew the increase. There is plenty of evidence, however, from common observation that the average poorly paid clerk or accountant has had no raise in the last 10 years.

THE RELATIVE SHARE OF THE WORKER IS GETTING SMALLER.

Wage earners received more money in 1909 than they did in 1904. Their average in the former year was $477, in the latter year $518, a difference of $41 or about 79 cents a week. The figures of wages are not yet classified for men, women, and children, and so we can not tell where the greater rate of increase has gone, though the probability is that it has gone to the men.

The value added to production (that is, the value of the product less the cost of materials) averaged $1,150 for each wage earner in 1904. It now averages $1,290. But the relative share of the worker in the value of his product is less than it was in either 1899 or 1904.

Here are the comparative figures:

Year.	Wages.	Net production.	Worker's share.
			Per cent.
1899	$426	$1,025	41.6
1904	477	1,150	41.5
1909	518	1,290	40.1

INSECURITY OF EMPLOYMENT.

One of the particularly brutal elements of capitalism is shown by the figures for the seasonal variations in the amount of employment in the various great industries. Capital can not keep its workers employed.

When it wants them it wants them bad; and when it does not want them, they may go and starve. In some of the industries the variation in the state of employment is only moderate.

In printing and publishing, for instance, the lowest number of wage earners employed at any time constituted 93.3 per cent of the largest number employed.

But in brick and tile making the minimum represented only 36.5 per cent of the maximum, and in canning and preserving only 12.9 per cent.

Even in the great steel and iron industry the number employed in March was 25 per cent less than that employed in December. Throughout the whole industrial scheme seasonal unemployment is a necessity under capitalism.

NUMBER OF CAPITALISTS SMALL; WORKINGMEN ARE MANY.

Moreover, another fact must be taken into consideration. The capitalist class numbers only about 4 per cent of the population, the middle class 24 per cent, and the working class 72 per cent.

WE LOOK UPON TARIFF ISSUE AS A SHAM BATTLE.

Under these circumstances, is it surprising that we look upon the agitation for a low tariff or for a high tariff as a shameless humbug when we compare its importance with the question of the exploitation of labor?

Is it surprising that we look upon the return of tariff issue as simply a sham battle to divert the attention of the workingmen from the main issue?

WORKINGMEN'S LABOR BOUGHT IN OPEN MARKET.

And the real issue is this:

Under the present system, which we call in political economy the capitalist system, the workingman's labor has become a mere ware in the market.

And since the man's labor can not be separated from the man, the workingman himself has become a commodity, whose time is bought and sold. The workingman, or rather his labor power, is subject to the same conditions as every other ware, especially to the conditions of supply and demand and to competition.

The workingman's labor—that is, his time—is bought now in the open market by the highest bidder on the one hand, from the lowest seller on the other.

And the employers—who are really the master class—care only to buy the workingman's time when he is young, strong, and healthy. When he is sick, or when he gets old, the employer has no use for him.

NOT IN BUSINESS FOR CHARITY.

The employer is not in business for the sake of charity. He is in business in order to make profits—to make money.

And because of this, we can see that our so-called free workers are sometimes worse off—from the purely economic point of view—than the blacks were under slavery before the war.

The negro was property and represented about a thousand dollars in value—sometimes more, sometimes less—he was property which the master owned. Therefore, the master, if he had any sense, took good care of his human chattel. The master was eager to have the slave as long and in as good condition as possible. When he became sick, or when he died, the master lost money.

The case is entirely different with the white workingman, the so-called free workingman. When the white man is sick, or when he dies, the employers usually lose nothing.

WORST EMPLOYER SETS THE PACE.

And high tariff, or tariff for revenue only, or free trade, "have nothing to do with the case."

The fact is that the capitalist, the average employer of today, is more concerned about a valuable horse, about a fine dog, about a good automobile, than he is about his employee, or about his employee's family.

In most cases, the employment is absolutely impersonal. The employer does not know his employee by name, or even by number. This is invariably the case with a stock company where the shareholders are scattered all over a city, a State, or all over the country, sometimes over Europe.

Nor can any individual capitalist or employer, no matter how charitably inclined he may be, change anything in these conditions. A business or corporation that should try to run its plant on a charity basis would not last long.

As a matter of fact, under the present system it is usually the worst employer who sets the pace. The employer who can fleece and skin his workingmen best is best equipped for the fight in the open market. He can produce his goods the cheapest.

COMPETITION AND LABOR.

Thus competition has come to have a fearful meaning to the working class.

On the one hand it compels the employers to get their labor as cheaply as possible, on the other hand it compels the workingmen to compete with one another for jobs. Competition among the workers has become, therefore, a cutthroat competition. It is a question as to who is to live and who is to starve. It is often a question as to whether a man is to stay with his family or to become a tramp.

And the tariff has nothing to do with that question, either.

There is always free trade in labor.

WOMAN AND CHILD LABOR.

In many cases now the laborer is compelled to disrupt his family and send his wife and children to the shop or factory.

For this is the great curse of machinery—or rather of the individual monopoly of machinery—that capital can be coined out of women, and even out of infancy. Thus not alone are men turned into wares, governed by demand and supply, but they are also made to scramble for a precarious living with the wives, sisters, and children.

The evil of child labor is especially glaring down South, where my Democratic friends rule absolutely.

Lewis W. Hine, while taking photographs of the employees of the Gulf coast canneries for the National Child Labor Committee, says that he personally interviewed 13 children from 3 to 5 years old, 25 from 6 to 8, and 15 from 9 to 11, and that he counted in all 125 boys and girls whom he judged to be from 3 to 11 years of age.

No human being knows how many children under 10 are employed in the canning industry in the United States or in the numberless industries carried on in tenement houses in our great cities. But everyone at all familiar with the subject knows that there are thousands.

THE DEMOCRATIC SOUTH LEADS IN INFANT LABOR.

In six Southern States nearly 1,000 children from 7 to 11 years old were found at work in cotton factories by agents of the United States Labor Bureau, whose investigation covered only about one-fourth of the cotton industry of these States.

It is conservative therefore to estimate that 5,000 children from 7 to 11 years old are prolonging their infancy in the cotton mills of the South.

And yet this is the economic basis of the wage system.

THE SOCIALIST VICE.

Therefore we say the wage system was a step in the evolution of freedom, but only a step. Without trades-unionism and labor associations, the wage system would produce a social state lower than that of feudalism.

Social freedom, complete justice, can be accomplished only by the collective ownership and democratic management of the social means of production and distribution.

We realize that all this can not be brought about by a single stroke—by a one day's revolution. But we know that all legislation, in order to be really progressive and wholesome, must move in that direction—must be in accordance with the modern economic progress.

THE ONLY PARTY KEEPING STEP WITH THE TIME.

And the only party that is in accordance with the trend of the time is the Socialist Party. That is the reason why all the "progressives" are simply trying to appropriate some of our minor planks.

With the Socialists political issues are of minor consequence; economic issues are of paramount importance.

DIRECT LEGISLATION ONLY A CHANGE IN THE MECHANISM.

We refuse to be diverted or led astray by mere political reforms like the initiative, referendum, and recall. Each in itself is a good enough reform. Each of them has been agitated for a long time by the Socialists and forms a part of our program to-day.

Mere changes in the mechanism of expressing the will of the people are, however, of secondary importance when compared with any change in the economic conditions of the people.

We want the initiative. But we want much more, to secure an old-age pension for every workingman and workingwoman of 60 and over.

We stand for the referendum. But insurance against being out of work is of much more value.

We agitate for the recall. But State help for orphans—at least for those who have no father—and assistance for working women during the period of child bearing, is infinitely more useful to the race than the right to recall a judge.

The bourgeois reformer, even when well meaning, does not understand us. He lacks our class consciousness.

A GROWN-UP NATION WEARING ITS BABY CLOAK.

Of the political reforms a new Constitution is most important. As long as we have the old Constitution, thorough social reforms are almost impossible.

No matter how good and beneficial a law may be, it will, as a rule, be declared unconsitutional by the Supreme Court. Our Constitution was framed at a time entirely different from ours, and for entirely different conditions—and good laws suited to the present conditions are really unconstitutional.

When our Constitution was framed this was a Nation of frontier farmers and hunters, with a few merchants in the seaports.

There was no machinery used. There was no manufacturing to speak of. There were no railroads; no telegraphs.

There were no millionaires and no proletarians. There were no corporations in the present sense—a corporation in those days meant a city.

And there were no trusts, of course.

If Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Hamilton could get up from their graves to-day they would not know the country. We live in a different world.

And yet we have to wear the same political cloak. We must live under the same Constitution.

In other words, a grown-up nation has to wear its baby cloak. It does not fit anywhere, and has been torn and patched in the most ridiculous way by "decisions of the Supreme Court," in order to make it do, yet, anybody who dares to suggest a new suit is considered a traitor by the "interests."

A NEW CONSTITUTION OR A BLOODY REVOLUTION.

But we must have a new Constitution or we shall have a bloody revolution. Yet, though political reforms are necessary, they are of little account when compared with the necessity of changes in order to keep step with the development of economic conditions.

THE TRUSTS AND THE PEOPLE.

The economic changes are upon us.

We see the trusts not only doing away with competition, but also asking for Government interference and for Government regulation of prices.

In other words, we have the spectacle of the trusts surrendering part of their ownership and practically offering that part of the ownership to the people.

Thus the trusts, or at least some of the trusts, are willing to part with their ownership because they feel that their business has ceased to be a private concern. Because the trusts feel that their business has become a public utility of the most public and utilitarian sort.

WORKING CLASS BECOMING REVOLUTIONARY.

But the change is also coming from the other side.

The great majority of the people have no interest in keeping up the present system. And especially the working class is bound to become revolutionary as a class.

Our workingmen to-day build a few palaces and many hovels. The workingmen live in the hovels and the few capitalists in the palaces.

Our workingmen in the woolen mills make a small amount of fine clothes and millions of yards of shoddy. The workingmen wear the shoddy and the rich idlers wear the fine clothes.

Workingmen and their children have to go down into the mines, workingmen and working women and their children have to go into dingy, ill-ventilated factories and workshops and toil from 8 to 12 hours a day. They must ruin their health by overwork, so that a few people who have the money may ruin their health by too much leisure.

The majority now degenerates through poverty so that the small minority shall be able to degenerate through luxury.

THE RULING CLASS OF FORMER DAYS.

Again, I say, the great majority have no interest in keeping up the present system.

There is this also: In former epochs the ruling class was by far the abler and stronger—physically and mentally.

In former years a few nobles, clad in iron—and trained and accustomed to warfare—could hold in subjection 20 times their number of common people.

The ruling class only was at that time in the possession of the wisdom of the world—whatever wisdom the world had then.

The ruling class at that time also had in its favor the belief that this system was God-ordained. and that anybody rebelling against it was a rebel to God.

THE RULING CLASS OF TO-DAY.

Things are different nowadays.

The working class not only builds the houses, ships, and machines, but the working class also teaches in the public schools and colleges, and writes and prints our literature. Not only the man who sets up the type for the papers and the books, but also the man or woman who writes them usually belongs to our class.

The capitalist class depends upon us for a living, for information, and for defense.

The ruling class surely has no better fighting qualifications than we. It is our class that has to furnish most of the men in case of war, although the capitalists may start the war and buy the bonds. Even in order to hold the working class in subjugation, the capitalists have to hire such workingmen as are for sale to do the fighting for the rulers.

We deny that the capitalist class is our superior in any way.

And as long as the public schools exist, and men and women are learning how to read and write, no priest or clergyman will ever be able to make us believe again that this system is God-ordained. We will never believe that it is God-ordained that a trust magnate shall have fifty or sixty million dollars a year, or more, and that his employees should earn $1.75 a day on the average.

AND WE ARE MANY.

Moreover, we have the ballot. No subjected class in history every had the same political basis as the ruling class. The modern proletariat is the first.

On election day my vote is as good as Rockefeller's. And we are many and the capitalists are few.

NO OTHER PARTY HAS GROWN LIKE OURS.

In short, the future belongs to the working class. Nothing can stop us. All we have to do is to organize our forces. There is no other party that has grown like ours during the last four years.

WHY WE ADVOCATE REFORMS.

And, I want it understood, the Socialist Party, while it is revolutionary in its final aim, is none the less distinctly evolutionary and constructive in its method. We welcome all kinds of reforms that are real reforms—not political baits.

Social reforms of all kinds are welcomed by the Socialist for many reasons.

In the first place, by reforms we can stop the increasing pauperization and consequently also the enervation of the masses of the people. If real reforms are seriously taken up and carried out with determination they uplift the masses to a considerable extent.

But the main reason for our favoring social reforms is that such reforms, if logically carried out, offer the possibility of a peaceful, lawful, and orderly transformation of society.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY IS THE ONLY TRUE REFORM PARTY.

The Socialist Party, therefore, is the only true reform party in existence. We agitate for the organization of the masses. And organization everywhere means order.

We educate, we enlighten, we reason, we discipline.

Besides order we bring also law, reason, discipline, and progress to men and women who have been torn from their old conditions by capitalism—and who would become Apaches.

THE APPEAL OF THE SOCIALIST.

It is, therefore, absolutely false to represent our Socialist Party as destructive, as intending to overthrow and annihilate society, as an appeal to the brute passions of the masses.

Just the opposite is true.

Our Socialist Party wants to maintain culture and education and carry them to the homes of every worker of the land.

Our party wants to guard this Nation from destruction and bring it to a level hitherto unknown in history.

We appeal to the best in every man, to the public spirit of the citizen, to his love of wife and children. [Applause.]

BOTH REPUBLICANS AND DEMOCRATS HAVE VOTED FOR THE SO-CALLED LABOR BILLS.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I have always had great admiration for the gentleman from Wisconsin, knowing him to be very generous and liberal minded in all matters; but I want to ask him if he does not give the Democratic Party credit for the passage of the eight-hour bill, the Child's Bureau bill, anti-injunction bill, the bill for jury trials in indirect contempts, the department of labor bill, the industrial-commission bill, and various other measures that are considered progressive and are wanted by the laboring class?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I have said before that these political reforms are of minor importance as far as the working class is concerned, and that social reforms are paramount. The eight-hour bill sounds good, but this House has passed several eight-hour bills since 1868.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I ask the gentleman if he does not give the Democratic Party credit for the passage of these measures?

Mr. BERGER. I will say that the Democratic Party has introduced some fair-looking bills in the House in the Sixty-second Congress, and that the Republicans, being also good politicians, have, as a rule, almost unanimously voted for them. None of these bills really changed economic conditions.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. The gentleman is mistaken about our starting it. I ask him if it is not a fact that we have passed it?

Mr. BERGER. Both sides passed these bills. Even the Socialist Party voted for them unanimously every time. [Applause.]

NONE OF THESE BILLS ADD TO THE STANDARD OF LIVING OF THE WORKING CLASS.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Then the gentleman must concede that it is good legislation.

Mr. HOBSON and Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. To every one, one after the other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must indicate the Member to whom he yields first.

Mr. BERGER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], then to the gentleman from Alabama, and then to the gentleman from New York, and afterwards to every other Member who may want to ask a question.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I think the gentleman will admit that the Democratic Party has passed more bills in the interest of labor than have been passed by this House in the last 20 years.

Mr. BERGER. I do not admit that. I said the Democratic Party has voted for some so-called labor bills, but so did the Republican Party, and so did the only representative of the Socialist Party in Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Then he admits that this is good legislation?

Mr. BERGER. I admit that some bills that have been passed in this session are fair bills as far as they go. Otherwise I should not have voted for them. They do not, however, add to the standard of living of the American working class. They are of ridiculously small importance, considering the magnitude of the labor question.

SOCIALIST HOUSE WOULD NOT HAVE WASTED TIME.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. If the House had been Socialistic it would undoubtedly have voted for the same bills.

Mr. BERGER. If the House had been Socialistic it would not have wasted time with insignificant palliatives of that kind, because it would have taken up legislation of a million times greater importance.

WOULD PENSION THE VETERANS OF INDUSTRY OUT OF THE SURPLUS THEY CREATE.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. If the House had been Socialistic, would it have passed the Sherwood pension bill?

Mr. BERGER. No; because we would have pensioned not alone the old soldiers but everybody who——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, just one question more. The gentleman said that if the Socialistic Party had been in power they would have pensioned everybody. I want to ask the gentleman who said the party would not have supported the Sherwood pension bill pensioning the defenders of this great country, that it would refuse to pension the soldiers but would pension everybody, Members of Congress as well as everybody else, where would the gentleman get the money to pension everybody?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say that by pensioning everybody who did some useful work in their earlier manhood or womanhood it would be needless to pension the old soldiers. The old soldiers have done some useful work besides being soldiers in a war. I honor every man who went to the war to free the black man and to save the Union, but I honor just as much the men and women who are fighting for civilization every day—the men and women who are making our civilization possible.

Official figures show that 35,000 are annually slain in the industries of the country, not counting the hundreds of thousands that are the victims of occupational diseases.

Do you not think that a man who works for the welfare of the Nation on the battle field industry is taking as many chances as the man going to war? And that the worker is doing more necessary work than the soldier?

Moreover, the old working people who will get the pensions will have paid for them during the time they worked. In fact, they will have paid for the pensions many times over before they get them.

As I stated before, in 1909 every workingman and working woman added about $1,290 worth to the Nation's wealth and received on the average only $512 in wages.

The pensions should be paid from the surplus value the capitalist class is getting.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. The gentleman said he would pension everybody.

Mr. BERGER. Everybody who needs it—every aged worker in every field of industry. Members of Congress only if they should be in want at the age of 60. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Then the gentleman modifies his statement. He does not mean to pension the Rockefellers and the Carnegies.

AS TO THE EIGHT-HOUR BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin know that until the Democrats got control of the House of Representatives neither the Republicans nor Democrats nor Socialists could get a chance to vote for an eight-hour bill?

Mr. BERGER. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me to inform him, I have served in the House 14 years, and until the Democrats got control of it an eight-hour bill could not be reported into a Republican House from the committee.

Mr. BERGER. And I want to inform the gentleman from New York, if I may, that the first eight-hour bill was passed in 1868 by a Republican House. [Applause on the Republican side.] As a Socialist and trades-union man I have, of course, no more love for one capitalist party than for the other, but I want to be fair.

Mr. MILLER. That was before the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the Republican Attorney General so construed it as to make it absolutely valueless. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BERGER. Well, we do not know how this bill may be construed by a Democratic Attorney General and by the Supreme Court. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there is a Democratic administration, there will be no fault found with it.

Mr. BERGER. Then the gentleman thinks the Supreme Court decides questions of law according to politics?

THE DEMOCRATIC SOUTH AND THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BERGER. I believe I should yield now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. He asked first.

Mr. HOBSON. I know the gentleman has a logical turn of mind, and the gentleman's party prides itself on its unanswerable logic. I simply want to ask the gentleman to point out the logic of his reference to alleged southern support for the principle of protection. The gentleman will recall that he pointed out that in the North, the Central North and the Middle North, the industries there have grown to stupendous proportions——

Mr. BERGER. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not make a speech. My time will soon be up.

Mr. HOBSON. I am coming to the question. The gentleman stated that the South was coming to stand for the principle of protection in order to protect their infant industries against competition. I will ask him how could they get protection against the giant industries within, and since they can get no protection from these, what effect can the tariff have in protecting the South when we already have the giant industries of the North in direct competition with them?

Mr. BERGER. We look at the tariff from the point of view of political economy. We know that agricultural countries subsidize manufacturers by a tariff in order to encourage them to build factories and invest their capital. From this capitalist point of view a high tariff is always necessary at first to protect young industries.

The North developed factories first. Naturally the North asked for protective-tariff legislation first, and got it. Now, just as naturally—and I do not blame the South—the South is trying to get high-tariff legislation for the manufacturers of the South, and I do not blame the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. HOBSON. I hope the gentleman will come to my question and not depart from it or try to escape from it. The South might logically desire to be protected against any strong competition, but the South can not be protected against strong competition that already exists in the great industries of the North, stronger than any industries abroad. Therefore, why should the South desire to get protection against competition on the outside that is not as dangerous as the competition that exists on the inside?

Mr. BERGER. I can only answer the gentleman from Alabama from my point of view, which is the point of view of modern economics. As I see it, the South still has the advantages of position for certain industries.

For instance, cotton is raised right there, and the cotton factory of the South saves the freight, of course. Furthermore, the South has cheap labor, unorganized labor, colored labor; it also has longer hours than the North. Then, you have woman and child labor—in some cases children from 3 to 11 years old are at work. ["Oh, no!"]

Well, in many Southern States that is the case in the cotton and in the canning industries. I do not mean to say that there is child labor in every industry in the South. For some work women and children are not strong enough.

"TEN MINUTES."

Mr. HOBSON rose.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am not quite through.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Make it 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended for 15 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be made 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to an extension of over 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to extending the gentleman's time for 30 minutes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I object to a longer extension than 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Wisconsin proceed for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say to the gentleman that all of those elements of production to which he has referred and which he has enumerated are true; that the South has advantages, but they tend——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] be extended for 10 minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

SOUTHERN MANUFACTURERS MAY COMPETE AT THE EXPENSE OF THE RACE.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I will not need that. I thank the gentleman from Illinois, but the gentleman from Wisconsin—the strong logician who has given us this admirable discussion—has not given a satisfactory answer. The things he enumerates would tend to relieve the South from the need of protection instead of explaining its alleged desire for protection. There is no such desire, and there is no logical foundation of the oft-repeated allegation that the South has come to advocate high protection.

Mr. BERGER. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that if it were not for the elements mentioned even a high tariff could not protect the South, but with those elements in existence the South may try, for a while at least, to successfully compete with the giant trusts. Of course it is a fight at the expense of humanity—at the expense of the race. Moreover, very soon the war will be found unprofitable and the combatants will unite.

As a confirmation of my statement that the South is beginning to ask for protection, the gentleman need only read over some of the discussions on the various tariff bills introduced by the Democrats themselves.

WHAT MR. BUCHANAN WANTS TO KNOW.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in his speech spoke of the working class and the capitalist class.

Mr. BERGER. And I hope the gentleman from Illinois knows that there are such classes in existence.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I shall not take issue with the gentleman in regard to that at this time, but I want to ask his definition of these classes. Does the gentleman define the working class as being composed of those who work for wages alone? I want to give the gentleman an example of what some would call a business man.

Mr. BERGER. Oh, I do not want a speech from the gentleman just at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I do not want to make a speech either. In my locality we have a man who is running a grocery store. His wife and daughter work in that grocery store. He also works long hours, early and late. He is in fact a workingman. Does the gentleman agree that a man who operates a business of that sort is a workingman or a capitalist?

THE THREE CLASSES OF MODERN SOCIETY.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, of course our present society does not only divide into two classes; there are three classes. We have the working class, the middle class, and the capitalist class. The lines are not very closely drawn in our century and our country. In some cases the workingman may have a little business on the side, or a capitalist may draw his income in the form of a salary, but as a whole it is safe to describe the division between classes as originating from the way a person derives his or her income.

The workingman or working woman derives his or her income through work for daily, weekly, or monthly wages, or, when working in schools and offices, through working for an annual salary. It is always work for pay—either work with hands or with brains, or with both, that gives the wageworker his status in society.

The middle class derives its income from rents and profits, either by buying and selling, or by employing a small number of men, women, and children.

The capitalist class derives its income in the same way on a large scale, besides controlling the means of transportation and communication, most of the natural resources, and the banks.

Of course different men have made different demarcations. But all agree that the smallest class in number but greatest in power is the capitalist class which controls the capital of the country—that part of the surplus value which is now used to create more surplus value instead of being used to give comfort to the people.

AS TO MEMBERSHIP IN THE SOCIALIST PARTY.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the Socialist Party confine its membership to the working class? Is it not a fact that it has some wealthy men in it?

Mr. BERGER. Oh, every honest man, even a capitalist, may become a member of the political party of the working class if he agrees to aid us in the emancipation of the working class. We must be satisfied, however, that the man is honest in his intentions to help us to bring about a complete change of the present system by sane and legal methods. [Applause.]

GOOD MEN DANGEROUS IN BAD PARTY.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to ask if the gentleman does not believe that Abraham Lincoln, who was the leader of the Republican Party during the war at the time the slaves were freed, would also exercise his influence if living to strike the shackles from the industrial slaves of to-day?

Mr. BERGER. He would, if he lived to-day. Lincoln would, in my opinion, be a Socialist, if he lived to-day.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then, after all, it is not so much in the party as the men who control the party.

Mr. BERGER. No. Men are the second consideration, principles are paramount. Good men are necessary, of course, to carry out these principles. But good men are useless or dangerous in the wrong party.

IF YOU WANT TO RIDE HORSEBACK, YOU WILL NOT TAKE A DONKEY.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact in this country, where the workingmen have the ballot, their troubles are largely due to their own inactivity in politics, and if they would exercise their united influence in politics it would put them in the position of controlling any party for themselves?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, the party must be worth controlling. It must stand for what a certain class or a certain group wants that party to stand, and must be made up accordingly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And would not any party serve their purpose if the working people would control them?

Mr. BERGER. No! No! No! If you want to ride horseback, you will not take a donkey. [Laughter.] The two old parties represent certain groups and certain interests of the capitalist class. Both of these parties are made up accordingly. They can never represent the working class.

The Democratic Party and the Republican Party have certain principles, certain ideas for which they stand. Their aim, their platform is capitalistic. They could not abolish the present system of exploitation without abolishing themselves. You can not expect a tiger to eat grass nor a gray wolf to live on berries. [Laughter.]

HONEST CAPITALIST LEADERS ARE LOYAL TO CAPITALIST INTERESTS.

The more honest the leaders of the old parties are, the more they will try to abide by the principles of their platform; the more loyal will they be to the capitalistic interest, which they represent.

GOAL OF SOCIALIST PARTY.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say in his address that the Socialist Party was in favor of common ownership of most of the agencies of production and distribution.

Mr. BERGER. For the collective ownership and the democratic management of the social means of production and distribution.

Mr. CLINE. I want to understand to what extent you carry that doctrine, and who and how are the beneficiaries to derive the profits of it.

Mr. BERGER. Well, the Socialist Party stands for the collective ownership of the social means of production and distribution.

Mr. CLINE. How are you going to evolve the system?

A NATURAL AND SCIENTIFIC ORGANIZATION OF SOCIETY.

Mr. BERGER. We believe that everything that is necessary for the life of the Nation, for the enjoyment of everybody within the Nation, the Nation is to own and manage. Therefore we shall take over the trusts, railroads, mines, telegraphs, and other monopolies of national scope. Everything that is necessary for the life and development of the State the State is to own and manage. There are certain business functions that the State will have to take care of, like interurban lines, for instance. Everything that is necessary for the life and development of a city the city is to own and manage, like, for instance, not only street cars and light and heating plants, but also abattoirs, public bake shops, the distribution of pure milk, and so forth. Everything that the individual can own and manage best the individual is to own and manage. That is simple enough.

In other words, the trust as a business has reached a stage where it is unsafe in private hands; it is a menace to the Nation as long as it is in private hands. It can only be managed by the Nation for the profit of everybody. The same holds good for certain private monopolies in cities, as far as the cities are concerned.

THE NATION COULD GET THESE PROPERTIES EASIER THAN THE TRUSTS GOT THEM.

Mr. CLINE. How are you going to change the present economic basis? Give us a concrete statement of that proposition.

Mr. BERGER. That is easy enough. We could surely get the trust properties in the same way as the trusts got them. The trusts paid for their properties almost entirely in watered stock, preferred and common. We can give the best security in existence to-day—United States bonds.

Mr. CLINE. Have the Government buy them?

Mr. BERGER. Have the Government buy the trust properties. Why not? But pay only for the actual value. That will be paid for out of the profits of these trusts in a very short time.

MR. BARTHOLDT MAKES A STATEMENT.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I merely wish to make a correction here. It may not be important to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but it is of some importance to the people who are to judge between the two parties—the Democratic and the Republican Party. I wish to say that the original eight-hour law was placed upon the statute books by the Republican Party, signed by a Republican President; that since that time a bill which has recently been passed has been reported three times to this House by a Republican Committee on Labor and was passed twice by a Republican House and was hung up in the Senate. I merely state that as a correction.

Mr. BERGER. That is not a question, though.

Mr. DYER. It is information, though.

MR. ANDERSON ASKS ONE MORE QUESTION AND GETS AN UNEXPECTED ANSWER.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. BERGER. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. For just a short question. I have always taken a great interest in matters of labor legislation——

Mr. MANN. We agree to that; do not tell us that.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Speaking of the eight-hour bill, the gentleman claimed that he voted for all labor measures. Now, the bill went to the Senate and was amended, and when it came back was the gentleman present and did he vote for that bill, or was not he in Indianapolis?

Mr. BERGER. Supposing I did go to the national convention of the Socialist Party. I was surely doing as good work in Indianapolis for the welfare of the country as I do here. It was fully as important that I should attend a convention of the Socialist Party as to vote for some of the demagogical and insincere bills put up here by the party of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], in order to catch the labor vote for capitalism and the Democratic Party. In fact, it was more important for me to be in Indianapolis.

MR. MANN'S FINE MEMORY.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. That does not answer the question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin may not have been here, but the gentleman from Ohio certainly was not. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BERGER. I thank you one and all, gentlemen. [Loud applause.]

STATISTICS OF COTTON.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish the statistics of cotton.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1019).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

W. C. HOUSTON,
JNO. H. SMALL,
E. D. CRUMPACKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
S. GUGGENHEIM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended as to each of the said amendments in the accompanying conference report:

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2: The bill as passed by the House provides for the collection of certain cotton statistics monthly; the Senate amendments Nos. 1 and 2 provide for the collection of those statistics quarterly each year. Those were the only amendments made by the Senate, and the Senate recedes from them and leaves the bill as originally passed by the House.

W. C. HOUSTON,
JNO. H. SMALL,
E. D. CRUMPACKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21477) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2004) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co., asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. PAYNTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some brief extracts from a recent issue of the American Anti-Socialist giving the opinions of Thomas Jefferson on socialism and giving the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER], as expressed at a recent convention of his party, as to what is likely to happen to small farmers under socialism. I also ask to print in the RECORD a recent article from the American Anti-Socialist, containing information of what to read and where to get it, on the subject of socialism. Both articles are very short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain articles which he has named.

Mr. BERGER. What is the nature of these articles?

Mr. RAINEY. The nature of them is antisocialistic. It gives Thomas Jefferson's opinion about socialism; it gives the extracts from the speech of the gentleman [Mr. BERGER] on the subject of socialism——

Mr. BERGER. Where?

Mr. RAINEY (continuing). Which recently was reported in the Chicago Daily Socialist, and which I think you made at the last convention of your party, and which would show what would be likely to happen to small farmers under socialism. And I am also asking to insert in the RECORD, in connection with your speech, a line of books to read on the subject of socialism, which recently appeared in the American Anti-Socialist, so that we can have both sides of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. I object.

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] believe in socialism?

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read these articles in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent for sufficient time in which to read the articles which he desires to have inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. AUSTIN. I object.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject.

Mr. AUSTIN. I object.

Mr. RAINEY. I have no objection to the objection of a man who is in favor of the Water-Power Trust.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 637 (H. Rept. 1028).

Resolved, That the following bills shall be considered as privileged and having the same status for consideration as bills coming from committees having leave to report at any time, the consideration thereof, however, not to interfere with appropriation bills, tariff bills, or conference reports, to wit: H. R. 23673, a bill to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen; H. R. 16692, a bill to provide American registers for seagoing vessels wherever built and to be engaged only in trade with foreign countries and with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, and for the importation into the United States free of duty of all materials for the construction and repair of vessels built in the United States, and for other purposes; H. R. 15357, a bill to regulate radio communication; H. R. 24025, a bill to amend sections 4400 and 4488 of the Revised Statutes, relating to inspection of steam vessels, and section 1 of an act approved June 24, 1910, requiring apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean-going steamers; H. R. 23676, a bill to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States; H. R. 22871, to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto; H. R. 22593, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for physical valuation of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks and bonds and boards of directors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

Mr. HENRY. Not unless the previous question is ordered, Mr. Speaker, and I have not called for the previous question yet. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to an hour.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Texas strenuously object to an amendment including the bill (H. R. 24119) to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes? Among other things, it is a bill designed to prevent the introduction into the United States of the Mediterranean fly and the potato-blight disease that is very prevalent in some parts of the world.

Mr. HENRY. Reported by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. MANN. Yes; reported by the Committee on Agriculture, with a unanimous report.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I shall not object to that.

Mr. MANN. Some gentlemen are very anxious to have it considered, if there is any chance.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no objection. If the gentleman wants to make a request to include it, it will be all right.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend the resolution by adding to the description of the bills, at the end of the description, H. R. 24119, with its title.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please send that bill up?

Mr. MANN. It is No. 223 on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of the rule, "H. R. 24119, to regulate the importation of nursery stock and other plants and plant products; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts for plant diseases and insect pests; to permit and regulate the movement of fruits, plants, and vegetables therefrom, and for other purposes."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question on the resolution and amendment thereto.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to ask the gentleman at this time whether he will agree to the offering of an amendment to include the immigration bill?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question. We will have 20 minutes on a side for debate after the previous question is ordered. There has been no debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], will have 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, unless some one asks for an explanation, I think we might as well vote on the resolution.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman seems to have ample time at his disposal for discussion of the rule. I should like to have 10 minutes of time, from either side. If the gentleman from Texas can not yield me 10 minutes, I should be glad to have 10 minutes from the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] desires time to make a statement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection to giving the gentleman from Georgia five minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this rule is undoubtedly for the purpose of facilitating legislation; but I desire to call the attention of the House, and especially of the Democratic side, to the fact that included in this special rule are some measures of recent origin, the necessity for whose consideration is likewise of recent origin. Some of them have not been considered before any committee in their present form until recently.

We find in the Republican platform of 1896 language committing that party to the passage of a law to protect American labor against the pauper immigrants from Europe. In that platform this party declares that the reading and writing test is one of the ways of attaining the desired end. The Republican Party has passed through the Senate just such a bill, and it is now formally before this House.

In 1896 the Democratic platform said in words:

We hold that the most efficient way of protecting American labor is to prevent the importation of foreign pauper labor to compete with it in the home market.

There is a bill which has been reported from a Democratic committee of this House for more than two months carrying into execution that pledge of the Democratic platform of 1896. Sixteen years ago, when our party put that language in our platform, we were without power to perform. To-day, for the first time, the Democratic Party is in a majority in the House of Representatives, and a Democratic committee has reported to this House a bill carrying into effect our pledges to the people on this question. The Republicans, with much tardiness, have performed their part in the Senate. The best evidence of whether we will keep our pledges to the people on this question when we get the three branches of the Government is by our action now to show them that we perform our pledges when we have control of one branch of the Government. Do you propose now to bring in these special rules, and yet leave out the fulfillment of this platform pledge as embodied in a bill reported by your committee and now pending in this House?

The American Federation of Labor, the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, the Order of Patriotic Sons of America, and dozens of other patriotic organizations in this country have burdened the records of our Congress with a hundred thousand petitions calling for this legislation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the gentleman's friends who are controlling the time will yield me five minutes, I will gladly do so.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have no control over the time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I decline to yield. Does the Democratic Party think that because of alien pressure working on our Rules Committee and through other agencies it can defer this legislation now and still have the friends of this bill understand that we propose to enact it? I say to my Democratic friends, deal honestly and squarely. Do not dodge in the face of a presidential election. Do not try to please the foreign immigrationists by putting it off and then appease the friends of the bill by telling them "We will take it up later on." Rise, like the party of Jefferson should rise, to meet the issue. If we are ever going to protect America against the influx of the foreign horde, go now, when we have the power and do it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I can not, although I would be glad to if I had the time. Let no gentleman think that we will permit this bill to die in committee and deceive either its friends or its foes. Let no special manipulation defer this vital and burning problem in utter defiance of the will of the people and of our platform pledges and not expect to be answerable for it. This is wise legislation. The masses of the people in this country demand it. Our social conditions demand it. Economical conditions demand it. Moral betterment demands it. The commission which has published 40 volumes has reported in full more than a year ago that they recommend this legislation. How much longer do you propose to defer it? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House by any discussion of the rule. If any Member of the House wishes to inquire with reference to any of the bills included in the rule, if it is a bill that comes from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I should be glad to answer. Of the bills from this committee, the one known as the seamen's bill is the first.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman explain what that bill provides?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Generally it provides for better conditions at sea for American seamen; undertakes to abolish the law which punishes seamen for desertion. It provides that the crew space on vessels shall be increased from 72 cubic feet to 100 cubic feet—that is, for vessels hereafter constructed. It provides that hereafter a certain percentage of the crew of the vessel shall be able seamen, and the percentage shall be increased each year thereafter until 75 per cent of the deck crew shall be able seamen. It provides that treaties with foreign countries which provide that we shall enforce their law with regard to the arrest of deserting seamen shall be repealed.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill which the gentleman refers to has 17 sections and covers 18 pages and is a House Calendar bill. What is the gentleman's purpose with reference to debate on the bill? Of course the gentleman can move the previous question on that bill if this rule is adopted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have had an interview with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] with reference to general debate. My intention is to ask unanimous consent to a certain limited time for general debate and then for consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect to ask in the House for unanimous consent to consider the bill under the five-minute rule? The gentleman understands that under this rule there is no consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I expect to ask for unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall be limited to one hour or one hour and a half, one-half of the time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN. I think more time would likely be desired on this side.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And then for the bill to be considered under the five-minute rule until its consideration is concluded, and then the previous question to be considered as ordered on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman is willing to consider the bill for amendment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule of the House it would not be so considered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is what I intend to ask when I ask to agree upon the time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there will be an agreement to that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We feel very grateful to the Committee on Rules and to the House for the privilege of calling these bills up.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state whether this bill applies to lake ships as well as to ocean-going ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but it does not affect them much because the cargo vessels have very small crews. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will now use some of his time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to criticize the Committee on Rules for reporting in this rule. We have reached that stage in the proceedings of the House where bills of high privilege have mainly been disposed of, and we have reached that stage in the proceedings of the House where ordinarily in the history of the House we have come to the point where bills on the calendar may be reached and considered. It has been the effort in the House ever since I have been here at different times to get some bill up, having the right of consideration, for the purpose of shutting out everything else. I have never been in favor of any of those propositions. In the past, whenever an effort has been made and I have had the opportunity, I have called the attention of the House to the fact that making a certain bill privileged meant that no other bills would be considered.

We have a rule of the House that applies and especially applies to this stage of the proceedings in the House. I refer to paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV, applying to every day:

> After the unfinished business has been disposed of the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order and then select committees, and each committee when named may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar, and if the Speaker shall not complete the call of the committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the last bill under consideration.

With another provision, paragraph 5 of the same rule:

> After one hour shall have been devoted to the consideration of bills called up by committees, it shall be in order, pending consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or, when authorized by a committee, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a particular bill.

Under this rule it is within the power of the House on any day to reach for consideration any bill that it desires to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman, he said that at this stage of the session the Speaker could order the committees called, that bills might be taken up. Is it not a fact that he could have the committees called at any time?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not quote me correctly. I did not say that at this stage in the proceedings the Speaker could call the committees. I said that that rule applied every day, but that at this stage of the proceedings the rule was especially in point and applicable.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But it could be put into effect at any stage of the session.

Mr. MANN. No. Theoretically it could, but practically it could not, because under other rules privileged bills cut that out; and under the rule which the gentleman has now reported, if agreed to, the rule which I have read is not worth the paper that it is written upon, because the moment a gentleman makes a motion to take up one of these other bills it cuts out the right to call committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question for his own information.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman contend that this subdivision 4 of Rule XXIV empowers the Speaker to shut out privileged bills?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not; but there are no privileged bills pending before the House seeking for recognition from the Speaker at this stage of the session, and we have reached that point of the proceedings of the House where this rule would bring before the House the bills on the calendar as called up by committees, and after an hour pending the call of committees it is within the power of a Member of the House to move to go into the Committee of the Whole for any bill on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the privilege of suggesting to the gentleman that there are already two bills made privileged, barring conference reports, made so by special order of the House, and if this rule is adopted then it makes this other bunch of bills and resolutions privileged.

Mr. MANN. I am also calling that to the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER. But there are already two to my recollection.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there are several bills on the calendar that are privileged, but none of them now seeking recognition from the Speaker, and this morning if it were not for this rule being presented now the call of committees would now be proceeding under the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is absolutely true.

Mr. MANN. This order when it is entered makes privileged a number of bills, bills that will occupy the rest of this session, in all probability, even if the session lasts, as it now looks probable, until the end of September. Meanwhile we have on the calendar a number of bills which gentlemen are very anxious to pass. There is a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary fixing the compensation of clerks of the United States courts, which ought to be taken up for consideration and passed in some shape. There is a bill to amend the immigration laws in relation to alien seamen and stowaways that ought to be taken up for consideration and passed. There is a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to pay cash bonuses for valuable suggestions in the naval plants of the Government, which ought to be considered.

There is a bill granting to civil employees of the United States the right to receive compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment, of great value to the employees of the Government, and that bill ought to be considered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MANN. There is a bill to establish a qualified independent government for the Philippines and to fix the date when such qualified independence shall become absolute and complete, and for other purposes. For it I do not demand consideration, but if I were in favor of that bill, as gentlemen are supposed to be on the other side of the aisle, I would want to have a chance to call it up, but if this resolution passes that bill is buried a thousand feet deep. There are a large number of bills, I think over 100 bills on the Union Calendar, 70 to 80 bills on the House Calendar, which might be reached in the ordinary course of business with the right on the part of committees to call up bills reported from the committees on the House Calendar, and the right of the House to call up for consideration any bill on the Union Calendar, but the bills that are not included in this resolution might well be placed in a category where all hope is lost. There is a bill in reference to the immigration question——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment—and that accounts for this rule. I am perfectly willing to meet the immigration question. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not believe myself in a literacy test, but I am perfectly willing to have it brought up in the House and to have it fought out on the floor of the House, but the gentleman from Georgia desires to have that done as he stated, if he has not he meant to, that if this resolution passes, that bill is buried mountains deep, never to emerge again to the surface. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the southern and eastern members of the Democratic Party on this side who have told their constituents at home they were in favor of this immigration bill will stand up with me and the gentleman to get a yea-and-nay vote on the defeat of this resolution, I will make every effort I can to get them to vote it down, so we can get up the immigration bill; and I would urge my friend on the other side to get his people to have a yea-and-nay vote——

Mr. MANN. We will have a yea-and-nay vote; anybody can have a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I fear my friend will have better success on his side than I will on mine, but the people will know in November.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia, whom I have found is one of the gentlemen new in the House who makes some use of the rules and his rights under the rules, that there is no difficulty about getting a yea-and-nay vote——

Mr. RODDENBERY. My leaders are against it.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And it does not require the gentleman to stand up to get a yea-and-nay vote. All the gentleman from Georgia has to do is to suggest to the Speaker, after the question is put, that there is no quorum of the House present.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Then, Mr. Speaker, desiring to get a quorum here on this question, I move now——

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman he might not get a roll call. If the gentleman is sincere, he will not ask for a quorum at this point.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest the gentleman from Georgia leave it to the gentleman from Illinois, and the chances are it will be well done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has not the floor, and neither has the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes privileged the bill (H. R. 22871) to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto.

For 50 years, Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government has been committed emphatically to the policy of aiding, developing, and encouraging agriculture.

This is the fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the first Morrill Act in 1862, an act establishing the agricultural colleges of the United States. Twenty-five years after that time the Hatch Act was passed, which provided for the establishment of agricultural experiment stations in each of the States whose duty it should be to engage in research work relating to agriculture. Since that time there have been three, I believe, important supplementary acts increasing the appropriations for these two funds. We have spent in the last 50 years for the agricultural college and experiment stations in the neighborhood of $67,000,000. We have expended this enormous sum of money in gathering together information touching agriculture. The purpose of the bill made privileged under this rule is to disseminate through the agricultural colleges to the people themselves on the farm the information that we have been gathering for the last half century. It is proposed in section 4 of the bill to appropriate to each State annually the sum of $10,000, provided that the State through legislative action has established within its agricultural college a department to be devoted to extension and demonstration work and home economics.

Beginning with the fiscal year 1914 the additional sum of $300,000 is appropriated annually and divided among the States in proportion to their rural population, conditioned upon each of the States appropriating a like amount, and the State receiving annually of this additional sum only so much as it is willing to duplicate, up to the point of its pro rata share of $300,000. This additional appropriation of $300,000 is increased each year $300,000 for a period of 10 years, when the bill ripens, and the total appropriation, provided the States duplicate it at the end of that time, will amount to $3,480,000 annually.

Mr. RODDENBERY rose.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am heartily in favor of the gentleman's bill, but providing in the same rule for the immigration bill would in no way hurt his bill, would it?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know that it would.

Mr. RODDENBERY. We want to vote against the resolution and send it back and get the immigration bill put in it according to Democratic promises to the country.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to say in respect to this bill, in which I am particularly interested, the Democratic platform recently adopted at Baltimore emphatically and in terms indorses the bill.

Mr. CLINE. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] use more of his time. I have only two more speeches on my side.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

[Mr. MORGAN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 51.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask a call of the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I desire to get Members over here so that they can find out what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. When the names of the Members are called, they will answer "present."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the Chair to announce that on this vote the Members will vote "present." Will not the vote be "yea" by those in favor of the motion to adjourn, and "nay" by those opposed?

Mr. MANN. Oh, that matter was disposed of before the gentleman raised this point.

The SPEAKER. Anyhow, it does not provide for the question of adjournment. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows 223 Members present, a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Further proceedings under the call are dispensed with.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe some other gentlemen desire to speak.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to use some of his time.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, let no Member of the House misunderstand the significance of adopting this rule. A vote for this rule consigns to oblivion and to defeat for this session the bill restricting immigration, notwithstanding the fact it has been reported by a Democratic committee, and now on the calendar for two months.

A vote against the adoption of this rule now is not a vote against these special orders, but is simply equivalent to an instruction to the Committee on Rules to report back this same rule with the anti-immigration bill made a special order therein. Let no gentleman think that he can say to those who have been advocating the passage of this immigration bill that he voted for the rule, but would have been glad to vote for a special rule containing the immigration bill, if he could, because Members know and the country will know that to vote down this rule does not defeat the special order at this time, but merely delays it so that consideration of the immigration bill can be placed in it. It will then be reported back to the House and we can not only vote on the questions now in the rule which we favor, but we can keep the plighted faith of the Democratic platform of 1896. Thus at the first opportunity we will carry out our word to the people. Since the day that Democratic platform was written we have not been in the majority until now. That party only is worthy of public trust when it keeps with honor its pledges to the people. I appeal to my colleagues to demonstrate our fidelity on this vote.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the gentleman will yield me one minute of time, I will gladly yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not the time, or I would.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I yield to the gentleman anyway.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman says that he is in favor of platform demands. What does he say to the platform demand of 1896 and several others in favor of liberal pensions to the soldiers of all the wars?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am in favor of them, and have voted for them since I have been in Congress, but never knowingly have I voted for a pension steal, and our platforms have never declared for that. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to counsel with my Democratic brethren as an humble Member of the House, and I want to say to you that so far as I am concerned I shall not be for this immigration bill at home and then dodge it or fail to perform the promises made to the people when I have a chance here in Congress to get the bill up for consideration. If you can do that, that is for the individual conscience of every Member. Let us join now the favorable action of the Senate and pass this bill. We need not pass bills in this House about the tariff and about the high cost of living, for the Republicans in the Senate will kill those bills or the President will veto them; but we have an opportunity now to pass something that the people want, that we know the Senate has passed, and which our platform demands. If we want to legislate for the constituencies who have sent us here, now is the opportunity to do it. This immigration question is vital to our civilization, and a refusal to go on record by defeating a yea-and-nay vote will not deceive the people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the five bills proposed to be considered under this rule are all good bills. One of them, the bill providing for free ships, is a party declaration. The other four are measures providing for safety of travel at sea, and one of those four not only provides for safety of travel at sea, but provides for freedom to the sailor, which he has never had. He is the only class of our citizens who at the present time is obliged to fulfill a civil contract to labor.

That bill has been before Congress for at least 18 years in one form or another. In addition to that both party platforms recently adopted declare for the principles involved in that bill, and I hope gentlemen will not put any obstruction in the way of the consideration of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP was recognized.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Before the gentleman begins, will he yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I would like to know if, in the numerous bills covered by this rule, there is included the bill by the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. LEVER, to prohibit gambling in grain?

Mr. CULLOP. No; I regret that it is not. Mr. Speaker, one of the bills provided for consideration under this rule is H. R. 22593, reported favorably by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The utility of this bill and its importance will readily be seen. It is an amendment to the interstate commerce law, authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and determine the physical valuation of the railroads of the country engaged in interstate commerce. It is one of the planks in the Baltimore platform, and is one of the propositions not only before the party but before this House, and is of more importance to the American people to-day for the adjustment of freight rates than any other proposition that will be before this Congress.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in their reports have requested this kind of legislation for some time back, and are advocating it now. I want to call the attention of Members of this House to the importance of immediate action on this measure. It has been by some one stated that for every dollar that goes into the Public Treasury under the administration of the present tariff laws $5 is collected and appropriated to the special interests as a tribute from the American people. For every dollar that is unjustly wrung from the American people to-day by the tariff $5 is wrung from the American people by the injustice employed in the fixing of railroad rates.

The basis now adopted is as follows: First, to pay the operating expenses; second, to pay the interest upon the bonds; and, third, to pay a reasonable dividend on the stock, both genuine and watered. It is the only business in this country to-day, as it is managed, that pays a dividend upon its bonded indebtedness and its stock, a proposition unreasonable and unjust and one that necessarily is indefensible as a business proposition. Now, the proposition is that the physical valuation shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of adopting a basis and that the rates shall be regulated upon what is actually invested and not upon the watered stock and the bonded indebtedness. Double dividends are now paid as a result of the present methods employed. For every dollar of bonded indebtedness capital stock is issued and held by the owners of the railroad, and to earn sufficient to pay on the amount represented by both is a double charge, and is indefensible and it works a hardship on the people; and this legislation is for the purpose of furnishing a remedy for this evil and to do justice to the producers and consumers of our country. The public demands it, common justice requires it, and duty to our constituents requires of us a full, fair, and earnest consideration of the proposition that the enterprise, industry, and thrift of the country may be fairly rewarded and encouraged. This subject is so important that it affects every citizen of the Republic, whether he be producer or consumer, whether he be rich or poor, and it behooves us as the representatives of a great people to take immediate steps to remedy this great evil and secure relief from its blighting effects. Transportation rates affecting all kinds of business and all classes of persons can never be equitably and fairly regulated until such a measure as this is enacted into law, that the commission may proceed in this all-important matter intelligently, taking as its basis the actual value of the properties involved and not their imaginary values, as is now used for a basis for the fixing and collecting of transportation rates. It is perhaps one of the saddest commentaries on the abuse of the conduct of great business in this country that the public has tolerated for these many years to be wrung from the public the excessive and unjust charges of transportation companies. They perform an important function in our commerce. Their earnings have been multiplied by exacting charges to pay dividends on watered stocks, for which there has been no investment and for which there is no property representation and never has been any. This evil interferes with the expansion of every industrial and domestic concern in the whole country; it restrains production and limits consumption; it increases the cost of living and diminishes the amount of wage the toilers receive. They are earning for the holders of their stocks, representing no investment, no property, no upbuilding of the country's wealth, large dividends at the expense of the honest business, the real investor, the actual producer, and the ultimate consumer. He must pay the toll and be subjected to the injustice foisted upon him by the system to swell the coffers of the promoter, the stock gambler, and the exploiter of the public through the medium employed by the "high financier," who thrives in his illegitimate business at the expense of honest business employing legitimate business methods.

To collect tolls for transportation sufficient to pay interest on bonds and dividends on stocks constitute a double charge. Both the bonds and stock represent one and the same investment. Either the amount represented by the bonds went into the property or it was a net rake-off to the owners, and if the latter the public should not be charged to pay dividends on it, and if the former, then it is represented by the capital stock, and to earn sufficient to pay a reasonable dividend on the capital stock covers both, or, in other words, all of the actual investment. Again it is a familiar fact that railroads are rich when rates of transportation are to be fixed and miserably poor when to be assessed for taxation. If this bill becomes a law and the value of all railroad properties is officially ascertained, then such ascertainment can be used both for fixing rates and taxation for public purposes, and will prove in this respect of incalculable benefit to the public. If such valuation is fair to fix rates for transportation, the amount the public must pay for service, it is equally as fair for public taxation, and the rule should work both ways and be used to answer both purposes. The companies could not complain over the adoption of such a rule. They could not in good conscience refuse to pay taxes for public purposes on a valuation which they adopt to fix the rates they charge the public for service.

Again, the adoption of this measure will enable the public to know, through the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission in ascertaining the real values, who are the owners of railroad stocks, bonds, and securities; also the duplication of directors and the holding companies, the manipulation of stocks, and the efforts and opportunities to restrict and prevent competition of parallel lines, and the inducements for such action. It will enable the commission to secure justice to the shippers of the country and tend to promote a healthy and prosperous condition of the transportation companies, to the end they will do a legitimate business on a legitimate basis, and the general public will be the real beneficiary as the result thereof. It will facilitate the prosperity of the country and inspire confidence in the business world and strengthen business stability in our commercial affairs and establish a standard of justice between the shippers and carriers of the country which will redound to the great good of the entire country. Let us keep our pledge to the people and do our duty to the business world in order that faith may be maintained in our promises to legislate in the interest of the common welfare.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that the facts and circumstances are such that I, as a member of the minority of the Committee on Rules, have felt in a position to defend in any degree the action of the majority of that committee. But in this particular instance the facts are such that I think fairness compels me to state that the criticisms that have been directed against the majority for the bringing in of this rule are not well founded; that the Committee on Rules in the action it has taken has not had any ulterior purpose or motive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very apparent that in the remaining days of this session this House can not consider all the bills upon the calendar. A large number of resolutions providing for the consideration of certain bills were pending before the Committee on Rules. The majority of the committee brought before the committee certain of these resolutions and the committee has acted upon them, and you find their action in this resolution now before you. The committee, I believe, has taken such bills as it believed were of great importance to the country, bills that would not receive consideration if they were not made privileged. Now, it is true that there are other bills proposed of equal importance, and I would be glad as a member of the Committee on Rules to make those bills privileged. The immigration bill that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] has been discussing I, as a member of the Committee on Rules, should be glad to vote to make privileged. It is an important bill.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts and Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. LENROOT (continuing). Whatever my position may be on that or any other bill, I believe a bill of great importance ought to come to the floor of the House and Members vote for or against it. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean to say that all of these bills included in this rule are of more importance than the immigration bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not, but I do say that the bill with reference to the physical valuation of railroads is more important than the immigration bill.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it in the rule?

Mr. LENROOT. It is in the rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman tell me what prospect there is, if he knows, of getting any consideration of what is known as the Burnett immigration bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know, but I do know this, that unless you do get that bill privileged there is no prospect, probably, of its consideration at all, and if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY], instead of making the assaults that he has upon the floor here this afternoon upon the Committee on Rules, had directed one-half of that activity to the Committee on Rules in endeavoring to get favorable action upon a rule to consider that bill, he might have been more successful. But so far as I know, the gentleman did not appear before the Committee on Rules at all with reference to that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The question is on adopting the resolution.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a motion to recommit with instructions so as to include the immigration bill in the rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not move to recommit a resolution from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, for the first timo since I have been a Member I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is based upon a remark made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are out of order. After a motion to adjourn, nothing else is in order except the disposition of this rule.

Mr. RODDENBERY. No other motion to adjourn can be made.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There was a motion to adjourn, and nothing else is in order except a vote upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. No other motion would be in order, but the Chair is inclined to think that a Member has a right to rise to a question of privilege, if he thinks he has been maltreated.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, without imputing to the gentleman from Wisconsin any intention of reflecting upon me, as a matter of fact, his remarks that I have made no effort toward getting consideration by the Committee on Rules of the immigration bill reflects on my conduct. In a moment I desire to state, as a matter of privilege, that when I first came to Congress I introduced an immigration bill of this character, but more restrictive in many respects. After the present bill was reported favorably and on the 1st of June I introduced a resolution and had it referred to the Committee on Rules, asking that the immigration bill be made privileged and a special order for immediate consideration. On the 6th of June I addressed a letter to the gentleman, Mr. HENRY, the chairman of the committee, asking its consideration, which I now read.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman does not state any question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he did. The Chair was not listening very particularly to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, but the gentleman from Georgia states that the gentleman from Wisconsin said that he had not done anything to get a rule from the Committee on Rules with reference to the immigration bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman may understand what I said, I am very clear that my remark was that if he had devoted one-half of the activity before the Committee on Rules that he had upon this floor, he would probably have had some result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that unless the gentleman from Georgia had called the gentleman from Wisconsin to order at the time the remark was made a question of personal privilege is only in order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the point of order is well taken. The Chair thinks that a Member is entirely within his rights when he is jealous of his reputation. The Chair is not passing upon whether the gentleman's reputation has been damaged, but the gentleman from Georgia thinks it has, and he is stating his case, and the Chair holds that he has a right to state his case.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to read the letter which I addressed to the Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY, on June 6, 1912:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1912.

Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HENRY: On Saturday, June 1, I presented a resolution providing for a special rule directing the consideration by the House, as a special order, of a bill reported from the Committee on Immigration, further restricting alien immigration. The resolution having been referred to the Committee on Rules I should be pleased to have a favorable report of the resolution from your committee as early as possible. If it is the judgment of the committee that a hearing should be had on the rule, I should be pleased to be advised, as I would like to be present when the hearing is had and serve the committee in any way that I may in obtaining a favorable report.

Very truly, yours,

S. A. RODDENBERY.

And to this hour I have not been accorded a respectful acknowledgment of the communication by the distinguished chairman, much less a hearing. No gentleman can now question my activity or diligence.

Two years ago I addressed a similar request to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, respecting consideration of a tariff bill, and I did get from him a respectful reply. I challenge the gentleman from Texas to say that he has not consulted with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and other eminent opponents of restricting immigration who want to stifle this bill, and that he has not already agreed tentatively that his committee will not report it until December. Mr. Speaker, I have concluded.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I have concluded.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for one moment, inasmuch as the gentleman has asked for a reply, in order that I may make it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any question of privilege?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The privileged question is this, that the chairman of the Committee on Rules has no recollection of ever having received a letter from the gentleman from Georgia, and if he will send a copy of the letter or another original he shall have a very prompt reply.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Oh, I am opposed to a funeral any time after a month after the death.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will be glad to reply to the gentleman at any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has not been agreed to; it may have been agreed to by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the rule and the report relating to the radio-communication bill refers to the number of the House bill. At the time I introduced the resolution which is embodied in the rule the House bill was pending, and afterwards the House bill was laid on the table, and the Senate bill is now pending on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Is that the radio bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the radio bill, and I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 6412 be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to correct the number of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the corrected number.

The Clerk read as follows:

Change the bill H. R. 15357, a bill to regulate radio communication, to the bill S. 6412, a bill of the same import.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amended resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and two gentlemen are present, a quorum.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Eleven gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, is it too late to ask for a reading of the engrossed copy of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it has already passed.

Mr. MANN. It is a House resolution and does not have to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. It does not require an engrossed copy, and anyhow, if it had to be engrossed, it is too late, because the vote has been announced.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 23673 for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let us see whether we can not reach an agreement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And pending that request I also ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that two hours be given to general debate on the bill, and that following that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar. The request of the gentleman is that this bill be considered under general debate for two hours and then it shall be considered under the five-minute rule. Is that the request of the gentleman?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state that I do not think that two hours' time will be sufficient. I have requests from gentlemen who desire to speak upon the subject that will take more than half of that time. I think there should be at least two hours' debate on the subject on a side.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think general debate ought to be concluded this afternoon. I will agree to an hour and a half on a side, which will take us up to 6 o'clock, one half of that time, of course, to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the other half by myself.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman knows that this is a bill of great length, which practically revises the navigation laws of the United States in a great many respects, and the gentleman further knows that this particular bill as it is now written was considered in our committee but a very short time, and I think we ought to have a reasonable length of time for debating this bill, and it will take two hours on a side to go through and take up the various portions of this bill and discuss them so that the House may have some knowledge of it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My experience is the House does not get much information with reference to a bill under general debate, and I desire that it may be considered fully under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? Following what the gentleman has just stated, if general debate on this bill is closed by unanimous consent and the gentleman's request is agreed to to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, is it the expectation of the gentleman that he will be fairly liberal in debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so. There is no disposition to cut it off.

Mr. MANN. It is far more important in the consideration of a bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is my notion, unless I see evidence of a disposition to kill time and filibuster.

Mr. MANN. I can assure the gentleman that I think there will be no such disposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no wish to speak under the general debate myself at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it is especially desirable that we should have plenty of time under the five-minute rule. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on that point.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is one reason I do not want to consume so much time under the general debate.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like the assurance from the gentleman that we will have plenty of time to take up and consider amendments.

Mr. MANN. We have that assurance from the gentleman now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not wish to use this bill as a buffer to keep other bills from being considered under the rule.

Mr. MANN. There is no disposition to do that. Why not have three hours of general debate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will do that, although I would rather have two.

Mr. MANN. General debate can close to-day.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will accept that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Why not agree that general debate will close to-day?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In three hours.

Mr. LEVER. Make it 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has it within his power to move to adjourn at any time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But I do not want to violate the spirit of the agreement.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. If I find there is not enough call for time, I will gladly yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be three hours' general debate, and at the conclusion of the general debate the bill be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. In the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Under the five-minute rule in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That it be considered under the five-minute rule is a part of the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall proceed for three hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and that after that the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me? When does he expect to vote upon the bill?

Mr. MANN. It will probably get up on Monday.

Mr. CANNON. I presume after to-day it will go over until the first of the week. Do you propose to read it under the five-minute rule to-day?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who is chairman of the subcommittee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

[Mr. HARDY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

REPRINT OF INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to request unanimous consent to have a reprint made of the bill H. R. 20728, the Indian appropriation bill, together with the Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CONNELL). The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to have a reprint made of the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss this bill at this time, if at all, under the general debate, and I am going to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] to use some of his time. Before doing so, however, I desire to call attention to one paragraph in the views of the minority. I quote from the views of the minority:

> This bill is one of great importance, being practically a revision or a repeal of a large portion of the most important of our navigation laws. It is to be regretted that the majority of the subcommittee having the bill in charge has attempted to play politics in its consideration.

I wish to say that if there has ever been any political complexion to the consideration of this bill it has entirely escaped my notice. There is a difference of opinion between the members of the committee as to the wisdom of some of the sections of this bill, but if they are inspired by party considerations I have no knowledge of that fact. And again:

> The bill in its present form has never been considered by the full committee and no opportunity given to do so except in the most perfunctory way.

I think that also is an injustice to the committee. Ample opportunity was given for the consideration of this bill after it was reported back by the subcommittee, and no effort was made to shut off consideration by the committee; and if the bill was not considered more fully than the gentlemen who make this statement think it should have been considered, it was their fault, and not the fault of the committee. I have been present at every meeting of that committee, but these gentlemen can not say as much. Again, the minority say:

> The bill was referred to the subcommittee, who practically rewrote the bill. This committee held many meetings to consider it, but while outside interested parties were invited to these meetings and participated in framing the bill, the minority members of the committee were not permitted to be present.

The gentlemen are in error in that statement. There never was a time when this bill was considered by the subcommittee that any other persons were present than the members of the subcommittee, except one occasion. The shipping interests and the representatives of the seamen thought if they could get together before the subcommittee they might agree; and, adopting their suggestion, one night the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], chairman of the subcommittee, notified the representatives of the shipping interests, Mr. Livingston, the president of the Lake Carriers' Association, and others, and the representative of the seamen, Mr. Furuseth, along with other gentlemen, that they might be present. They appeared and discussed the bill back and forth until midnight. I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] was present at that meeting. Nothing came of that meeting. They did not agree on the provisions of the bill. That is the only occasion on which any representative of the shipping interests or seamen was present when the subcommittee considered this bill.

I simply make this explanation that this statement may not prejudice the House in the consideration of the bill. Whether the gentlemen were invited to be present at these subcommittee meetings or not, I leave to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to say. I was made a member of the subcommittee by the action of the committee and attended as many meetings as I had notice of.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands that this bill will relieve the shipping interests of the country of the present onerous navigation laws?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In what respect?

Mr. LEVY. By relieving us of the onerous laws that we now have. Will it not make it worse? Will it not drive our vessels from the sea?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it is a grave error to pass the bill if that is so.

Mr. LEVY. This is the first opportunity I have had to examine this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think if the gentleman studies the bill he could answer that himself.

Mr. LEVY. That is the reason I am interrogating the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it would.

Mr. LEVY. Does the gentleman think it will be a relief?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it will. That is, if the seamen are entitled to any consideration at the hands of Congress. I do not look at this question wholly from the standpoint of the shipowner.

Mr. LEVY. Our navigation laws are now very severe.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and I would not add any unnecessary burden to the shipping interests of the country.

Mr. LEVY. I thought the gentleman's committee was trying to relieve us of some of the onerous laws.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. From a competitive standpoint it does relieve the shipping interests.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALEXANDER], who preceded me, and I am somewhat surprised at the statements that he made here, for the reason that I was not called in as a member of the minority of the committee to the subcommittee meetings to consider this bill. If I recollect correctly, upon my motion in the committee, the chairman of the committee was added to the subcommittee, and a few days afterwards I met the chairman in the hallway of the Office Building, and he said to me that he did not think that the minority members of the committee, naming the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and myself, were using him right; that there were some features of the bill that he did not approve of; but we were not present at the meetings of the subcommittee to aid him in securing these amendments to the bill. I stated then, and I state it now, that I was not notified of the meetings of the subcommittee on this bill, and was not present at those meetings, because I received no notice of the meetings of the subcommittee to consider the bill.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I think I can make a statement respecting its matter with which the gentleman will not differ from me. It is true that myself and other members of the subcommittee met and talked this measure over personally for hours several times, but we never undertook to report this measure until I had notified the minority members of the subcommittee and asked them to meet with the full subcommittee and discuss the bill fully.

I admit I do not think they came, but there was no report until after the gentleman himself and the other Members of the minority had been notified of the meeting of the subcommittee. It is just as if in caucus or in the cloak room I might have had private conversations as I do with the other Members of the majority, but that bill was not reported back to the whole committee until after the gentleman himself had been notified of the meeting of that subcommittee to discuss and offer amendments, and I think some of them did come.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There were several bills before the subcommittee which were considered, bills of various kinds, but this bill brought up here to-day I never was invited to consider, nor was my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, as I have been informed by him.

Mr. HARDY. I will say to the gentleman he is absolutely mistaken in——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I decline to yield until I get through with my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest to the gentleman it is raining outside and you can not dry this linen, even if you wash it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I know that, but there is the question of fair dealing, and the statement in this minority report is correct that we received no notice whatsoever from the subcommittee that this bill was to be considered, and to confirm my statement I state what the chairman of the committee told me himself, that Mr. HUMPHREY, my colleague, and myself were not attending the subcommittee meetings, and we ought to be there in order—if we wanted amendments to this bill we ought to be there to sustain him in securing some amendments to the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would simply say this. There had been several meetings of the subcommittee before I met the gentleman in the corridor and chided him for not being present.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And did not I reply to the gentleman that I had not been invited?

Mr. ALEXANDER. He said to me that he had not been invited and to get after Mr. HARDY about it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And I was not invited.

Mr. HARDY. I will state if the gentleman never received the invitation before we reported that bill there is something deficient in the mail, and if he will go back and look over his mail I think he will find the notice.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I attend all meetings of the committee, and I think the gentleman will bear out my statement, when I am in the city. I attended all the meetings of a subcommittee when I have been invited, but on this bill I was not invited, nor was my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, invited in for the consideration of the bill——

Mr. HARDY. Let me say this matter was thrashed over in the committee. I do not think there was any question there but what he and Mr. HUMPHREY had been invited to the last meeting of the subcommittee. Was there any question as to your being invited as to the last meeting of the committee——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think this is a matter of testimony or that it is material to testify.

Mr. HARDY. I do not think it is material, but as we have gone into it——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will permit me for a moment, I do not think it is material to the issue of this bill as to what the majority did in relation to it any further than the fact that the minority Members did not have an opportunity to consider this bill that they should have had in the way of making amendments. I want to take occasion to exonerate the chairman of this committee. I am perfectly satisfied that the chairman of this committee did not know that the subcommittee had been meeting without inviting the other members of the committee, and he was a member of it himself. This condition did happen, that the subcommittee had meetings and they did practically agree upon the bill, and what I objected to was their bringing in the bill to which there was given very little consideration at the time.

Mr. HARDY. Did the gentleman receive notice to attend the meeting of the subcommittee at which the bill was finally agreed on and reported.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. My recollection is I did receive one notice to attend a meeting.

Mr. HARDY. That is all I claim.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This fact is true, that bill was reported before we had an opportunity to read it, except in the committee, and at the time that bill was reported there was no man except those on the subcommittee who knew what it contained.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has stated all I claimed, that before we reported that bill he received notice to attend the meeting.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would not have made as much of a statement as I have done if the chairman himself had not stated that we had taken the wrong position in making the statement in the minority report, but I believe the statement in the minority report is fully justified, and while I have expressed a great many times absolute confidence in the chairman of the committee, still the fact remains that the chairman of the subcommittee in some manner or for some reason, why I do not know, ignored entirely the minority in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HARDY. Yet I object to the statement that the chairman of the subcommittee ignored the minority.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. You did not ignore us on the bill of minor importance that you had under consideration.

The bill itself is a bill that changes the whole policy of the Government in relation to the manning of vessels. There are some very good features in it. As to the changes that are made that affect the foreign shipping, it is a matter of grave doubt as to whether it would be wise for us to make such a radical interference with foreign shipping. That, I suppose, will be determined after the bill is put into effect. We are experiencing in another body a little difference of opinion in regard to our views as to the use of the Panama Canal. Certainly if foreign Governments object to the use of a canal which we built with our own money, which we intend to use for the development of our merchant marine—if after we have built a canal and wish to use it ourselves, and prescribe the uses of it for our own vessels, objection is made by foreign Governments, certainly objection will be made by foreign Governments to our endeavoring to control the management and the policy of manning foreign vessels and in the management and control of their seamen employed on the vessels which they build and own. It may be wise. I trust it is wise. The probability is that this bill will at least pass this House, but it possibly may not be enacted into law. But I have grave doubts as to whether this will be of advantage to the American seaman. I will admit it may be an advantage to the foreign seaman, because no foreign seaman is to-day on anywhere as near as good footing as the American seaman is, and many of the features in this bill are distinctively in the interest of seamen of other nations.

There is one statement that I would make in regard to the cost of building American ships in American shipyards as against the building of foreign ships in foreign shipyards. For years we have had on the statute books, and it was in the Dingley law and also in the Payne-Aldrich Act, a provision that all materials going into the construction of a ship built for the foreign trade should be admitted free of duty. But the question of wages paid in the foreign shipyards and the wages paid in the American shipyards can not be met by any such proposition as that.

I have not before me the scale of wages paid in American shipyards in comparison with wages paid in foreign shipyards, but it is a well-known fact to one who will read history that the wages in the American shipyard are more than double what they are in the foreign shipyards, and to that element of wages largely the greater cost of construction is due. And however much we may attempt to escape that feature of the cost of the vessel, still it is that feature that has driven from our shipyards the building of vessels for the foreign trade and in addition the wages paid on the foreign vessel compared with those paid on the American vessel have operated against the American-built vessels, and make the features I have referred to the vast difference to the cost of the vessel itself and the cost of its maintenance.

All these propositions that may be submitted here will not tend to decrease the cost of maintaining an American vessel, but will rather add to the cost by increasing the expense of nearly every vessel in the trade. If any advantage comes to the American sailor there will no man be more gratified than myself. But to attempt to care for the foreign sailor to the detriment of the American sailor, I think is a proposition to which the American Congress should not give its assent. This bill provides for the taking care of foreign sailors and prescribing by American law what the foreign sailors shall do. If it should come to a point of affecting his wages and increasing his pay so as to make a direct advantage to the American sailor, to that part I would certainly agree. But by inserting these features to the disadvantage of the American sailor by bringing the greater competition from the foreign sailor in the American trade, I believe is in that respect a distinct disadvantage.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] yield? I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS], who wishes to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] a question; then I will yield 30 minutes to my colleague from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman about section 13 of this bill, and how far the language of that bill is intended to go?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. What section?

Mr. HARRIS. Section 13, to the effect that every vessel sailing out of a port of the United States shall carry one or two or more American boys as apprentices. Now, that language is pretty general. If it is as broad as your other thought, which means any ship of any nation, I want to know whether you mean to expatriate the American boys and drive them into the foreign trade? How far is that language intended to go?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is intended to apply to every sailing or steam vessel of the United States, and I may say it is the intention of the committee to offer an amendment to that section, which was omitted in making the report on the bill, the amendment being as follows:

Amend, line 15, on page 16, by inserting between the word "sailing" and the word "or" in said line the words "vessels engaged in the foreign or off-shore trade," so that it will read:

"That every sailing vessel engaged in the foreign or off-shore trade or steam vessel of the United States."

It is meant to apply solely to vessels of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not limit it to the United States, so that there will be no misunderstanding about it? You now say "any ship."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] proceeds I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] whether I understood him correctly to say that the passage of this bill would increase the cost of maintaining American ships?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To what extent?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can answer that question for the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I think on an important measure like this we ought to have the Members of the House present, so that everybody will understand what we are discussing. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 17.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Business having intervened, the point is overruled.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that there is no quorum present, and there is nothing to do but have a call of the House. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CONNELL). The call shows 202 Members present, a quorum.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Further proceedings under the call are dispensed with. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I trust that I may have quiet in the room, because it is too warm to speak against much confusion.

The bill under consideration is entitled "A bill to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen."

I may say to the Members present that during my almost 10 years of service upon the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries I believe this is the most important bill that has been reported by that committee. I think it means more to the American merchant marine; but, first, I want to point out to the Members of the House that it does not affect American sailors. This bill is intended solely for the benefit of foreign sailors. So do not let any man in this House waste any sympathy upon the American sailor with the idea that he is going to be relieved by this bill, because it does not affect the American sailor so far as the abolition of imprisonment is concerned.

In the first place, this Government some years ago abolished imprisonment in the coastwise trade. It is true, much to my regret, that the statute is still upon our books providing for the imprisonment of seamen in the foreign trade if an American sailor deserts in a foreign port. But I want to take occasion to say to the House that there has not been an American sailor imprisoned in the last 5 years, and I doubt if there has been a chain upon an American sailor in the last 10 years. So that all this talk about freeing the American sailor is for the purpose of arousing your sympathy, in order that you may vote for other portions of the bill.

To demonstrate the correctness of what I say, in the hearings, on page 31, I asked Mr. Walter McArthur, of San Francisco, editor of the Coast Seaman's Journal, the following question:

How many American citizens are there employed in the foreign trade?

He replied:

In the foreign-going trade of the United States? Not more than 5 per cent.

The foreign trade of this country that is carried in American bottoms amounts to only 7 per cent, and of that 7 per cent that is carried in American bottoms less than 5 per cent of the sailors are American sailors, and of what few are left practically all of them are in the ships that run under the subsidy act of 1891. So that this bill will not free any American sailor, because there are no American sailors to be freed by it, and because of the further fact that the statute now upon our books in relation to imprisonment in the foreign trade has been practically a dead letter for many years. I will say for the minority of the committee that they could at any time have had reported out of that committee by unanimous report any bill confining its provisions to American sailors and American ships; but the purpose of this bill, as I said before, is to assist the foreign sailor. In other words, you may look at this bill and read it through and study it and you will find that the whole purpose and intent of it is to hold out inducements to the foreign sailor who comes into an American port to desert.

I am not going to undertake to argue whether that is a good thing or not, but that is what this bill intends to do. I want to take this bill up and discuss the bill itself.

In the first place, I want to take it up by sections, because, as I said a moment ago, it is too warm to attempt to make a speech, except about the bill itself. I hope all of the Members have copies before them, and I call their attention, first, to page 2, line 11. There we provide how ships shall be manned. It says:

And in all merchant vessels of the United States the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into three watches.

Now, I see no particular objection to that provision of dividing firemen into three watches in the deep-sea trade and perhaps in the coastwise trade in some places. But on the Great Lakes there is no complaint from the firemen. They are not asking for three watches. If you do this you increase the number of firemen on those vessels. On the other hand the evidence before the committee is that the firemen on the Great Lakes are perfectly satisfied with two watches; that they are compelled to be on the vessel, and they would as soon work as be idle that portion of the time; and so you simply add a third to the number of firemen that will have to be employed on these ships.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Under the language in that section referring to vessels "at sea," does that apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was the opinion of the committee, and also of the attorney representing the Great Lakes, that it did. The Great Lakes attorney appeared before us and filed a brief. I intend at the proper time to offer an amendment making an exception of the lakes and inland waters of the United States, as far as firemen are concerned.

Mr. MANN. If it applies to vessels on the Great Lakes and vessels that travel only in the daytime across the lakes, would it require them to have three watches of firemen regardless of the fact that it would be impossible to put them all in service?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think so; why not?

Mr. MANN. I am asking for information.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it would. That is one reason why I think the requirement is unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. I did not suppose that that provision of the bill applied to the Lakes, because my understanding of it was that a provision of law relating to the merchant marine which said "at sea" meant at sea, and not on the lakes or inland waters.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think "at sea" means anywhere afloat unless specifically excepted.

Now, I want to call attention of Members to another section of the bill—and this is characteristic of the bill all through. I want to say in explanation to gentlemen present that I had but little opportunity to be present when this bill was considered or to offer amendments. I think if I had had the opportunity to attend the meetings of the subcommittee that some suggestions I might have made would have been accepted. I hope that some will yet be accepted by the committee.

Now, take section 3, line 7, page 4. It reads as follows:

SEC. 4530. Every seaman on a vessel of the United States shall be entitled to receive, within 48 hours after demand therefor, from the master of the vessel to which he belongs one-half part of the wages which shall be due him at every port where such vessel, after the voyage has been commenced, shall load or deliver cargo before the voyage is ended; and all stipulations to the contrary shall be held as void.

I want to call the attention of Members to this fact, that while the majority of the committee pretend they want to favor the American sailor and make him a man, all through the bill they take away his power to contract, the power to sell his labor as he sees fit. In one instance they claim that he shall be treated as a man and in another as a ward.

And when the voyage is ended every such seaman shall be entitled to the remainder of the wages which shall then be due him, as provided in section 4529 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That notwithstanding any release signed by any seaman under section 4552 of the Revised Statutes any court having jurisdiction may upon good cause shown set aside such release and take such action as justice shall require.

Whether or not that is a good requirement with reference to American ships, I want to call attention to the proviso:

Provided further, That this section shall apply to seamen on foreign vessels while in harbors of the United States, and the courts of the United States shall be open to such seamen for its enforcement.

How does it concern the people of this country whether foreign ships pay one-half of the wages due in each port or not? Why should we tell the foreign shipowner what kind of a contract he shall make in a foreign country? Why should we say to the foreign shipowner, "You may make a contract that is legal in your own country, but when it comes to this port it is illegal"?

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. In reply to that specific question, is it not of some importance to the people of the city of New York, for instance, whether a sailor lands in New York with $20 in his pocket or without a penny and entirely destitute?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly; but he does not have to land. What occasion is there for a sailor to land? Suppose he has made a contract to the contrary, why should we violate it?

Mr. COOPER. I suppose the gentleman has heard of the habit of sailors to land whenever they get a chance.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly; and that is the main purpose of this bill. It runs all through it. The purpose is to induce him to leave the ship. It throws out inducements to him to desert; so it provides that when he gets into any port he can go and demand his wages. Why should we tell Germany or any other foreign country how to run their ships when it does not concern the life or property of the American citizen?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Do not the provisions that put the sailor on a foreign vessel in an equal position with an American sailor on an American vessel when in our ports enable him to get the wages of our seamen and raise the wages of the foreign seamen coming into our ports, thereby putting us on an equal footing and enabling us to compete with the foreign shippers and prevent them from having cheap pauper labor bound down to them in such way that when they bring them here they can take them back as they came? In this way do we not prevent the foreign shipping from having the benefit of pauper labor if they have it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman thinks the condition of the foreign sailor has anything to do with the merchant marine, I will ask him the question that he asked of a witness in the hearings. He asked one of the witnesses if imprisonment of the sailor destroyed the American merchant marine, why has not the imprisonment of the foreign sailor destroyed the foreign merchant marine?

Mr. HARDY. The seamen's representatives before us answered my question that so long as seamen coming here on foreign vessels were bound down to their pauper wages there was no chance of elevating their condition, and therefore no chance of the American sailor retaining good wages and competing with them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What the gentleman intends to say is that he believes that by raising the wages of the foreign seamen in the American ports he will raise wages all over the world.

Mr. HARDY. We believe in equalizing the wages by raising the wages of the foreign seaman who competes with our seaman. I would rather raise the foreign seaman to the wage condition of our seaman than lower the wage of our seaman to that of the foreigner.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Just wait one moment. I want to finish the answer. Here is what this bill proposes to do: It proposes to hold out an inducement, as I have said, to every foreign sailor that comes into an American port to desert his ship; and then places him in a position where he can not be forced to go back on the ship unless his wages are increased. That is the purpose of this bill, and the gentleman agrees with me. Everyone who has studied this bill agrees with me that that is the purpose of the bill, namely, to induce the foreign sailor to desert and demand higher wages before he goes back upon the ship.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not at this time. Here is the situation: If we could control this situation all over the world, there might be some force in that statement; but we can not control the wages upon a ship that goes from Europe to South America, or that comes from the Orient to this country, or that sails anywhere, except it touches one of our ports.

What will be the result? The result will be that the British ship—which we will take for an illustration—coming to this country, if the crew deserts, will take a crew from the United States, which for the sake of the argument, may be a high-priced crew; but this crew will be immediately discharged in the home port of the ship. Every vessel will bring the cheap crew coming to our ports. The result of that will be that the highest rates anywhere for carrying freights will be from this country to foreign ports, while between foreign ports and from foreign ports to this country the rate will be cheapened; so that we propose by this bill—if there is anything in that argument at all—to increase the rate of freight to get our goods to foreign countries and to lower the freight rates between other countries and from other countries to this.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield a little further, I admit we can not control the wages between Europe and South America; but the gentleman admits that every seaman in this country favors this bill, because it will raise the wages of seamen coming into this country, does he not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not.

Mr. HARDY. I have never seen a seaman opposed to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If there is any force in the argument that is made that the foreign sailor is complaining because he is imprisoned; if there is any truth in other complaints that they are outraged and made slaves, then why not abolish servitude, so far as the American ship is concerned, and so far as the American seaman is concerned? Would not the foreigner, wanting to be a free man, have then every inducement to go on an American ship, and would he not become an American citizen? All he would have to do to escape the slavery we hear so much about would be to leave the nation that enslaves him and come to the one that has made him free.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not now. I do not have a great deal of confidence in the complaint of these gentlemen who want the United States to legislate for the seamen of other countries when those seamen are content to sail under the flag of those countries and do not attempt to become American citizens.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] a short time ago, when he was making a speech upon this subject, stated that the wages of the sailor was fixed according to the ports in which they were engaged.

Mr. HARDY. Where they were employed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That would carry out what I said—that the rates would be high here and lower everywhere else.

Mr. MADDEN. How would that affect the American sailor? For example, if wages in Liverpool, Bremen, or Havre, or Hamburg were lower than they are in New York City, would not sailors coming from those ports desert in New York, and would the sailors that were employed in New York then get a higher standard of wages than those that come from abroad?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Here is what would be the result if this bill is passed, so far as the sailor is concerned. Whenever he went upon a ship at an American port he would receive—theoretically that is—higher wages until that vessel reached a foreign port, when he would be immediately discharged or his wages reduced. All foreign ships in their home ports would sign their crews for the round trip. The seaman who had regard for his contract, who signed for the round trip, would keep his contract and stay with the ship, but the sailor who had no regard for the contract he made and no sense of duty, who knew he could take advantage of the American laws, would desert in our ports, and the result of it would be that the foreign ships would retain the good sailors, those who had the manhood to keep their contract, those who were too honest to practice a fraud upon those that employed them, while we would get those who cared nothing for their contracts; our ports would be filled with deserters; under this bill we would get the scum of all the seas.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there? Would not that same argument apply with reference to holding by criminal process or by arrest anybody else to any contract when once made for service on land as well as at sea?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am perfectly willing to join with the gentleman in abolishing any imprisonment of American sailors. Now let us proceed a little further with the bill. On page 5, commencing at line 4, there is a minor matter to which I wish to call attention of the House.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman answer one question? The gentleman says he is willing to join in abolishing imprisonment of American sailors. Do you still want the American Government to lend itself to a continuation of the imprisonment of foreign sailors on its shore?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not prepared to say as to that. I am strongly inclined to think that punishment for desertion ought to be abolished the world over, but I think we ought to do it in an orderly and decent way, and I do not think we ought to pass a bill of this kind without notice to other nations with whom we have treaties on the question. I think it might be wise to enter into negotiations with other countries. I would be mighty glad indeed if we could strike out the provisions of this bill upon that point and insert a section directing or requesting the President, through diplomatic channels, to take up this question for settlement with foreign nations. I do not think there is any such emergency when we have no American sailors; when we are legislating entirely for foreign sailors that we should rush this bill through in this manner.

Mr. HARDY. I want to see if I understand the gentleman's idea. I understand he is in favor of the principle of abolishing this imprisonment, but that he is opposed to the manner of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call attention to section 4. It says:

> Upon a complaint in writing, signed by the first and second officers or a majority of the crew of any vessel while in a foreign port, that such vessel is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea because she is leaky or insufficiently supplied with sails, rigging, anchors, or any other equipment, or that the crew is insufficient to man her, or that her provisions, stores, and supplies—

And then:

> Or that her provisions, stores, and supplies are not or have not been during the voyage sufficient or wholesome, thereupon, in any of these or like cases, the consul or a commercial agent who may discharge any of the duties of a consul, shall cause to be appointed three persons of like qualifications with those described in section 4557, who shall proceed to examine into the cause of complaint, etc.

Now, I submit, is not that provision a little bit too drastic? If it were upon a majority of the crew and one of the officers, I would have no objection to it, but here it proposes to put that entirely within the hands of the crew. The crew of a ship—and I am speaking in all respects—are the laboring men upon the ship—those employed to run it. This places the control of that vessel entirely in the crew. Should not the owners of the vessel have some representation, some part, in the control of it? Should not the officers have some authority? That is, however, only one of the minor defects of the bill. Now I want to call the attention of the House to some of the other portions of this bill. Take section 10, which is quite long; but I hope the House will follow me in reading it, because it describes the various things that shall be done, and all the provisions apply to foreign ships. Here is what it says about foreign ships that come to American ports:

> SEC. 10. (a) That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages, or to make any order or note or any other evidence of indebtedness therefor to any other person, or to pay any person, for the shipment of seamen when payment is deducted or to be deducted from a seaman's wages. Any person violating any of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, and may also be imprisoned for a period of not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or allotment shall in no case, except as herein provided, absolve the vessel, or the master or the owner thereof, from the full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit or action for the recovery of such wages. If any person shall demand or receive, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or other person seeking employment as seaman, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever for providing him with employment he shall, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than six months or fined not more than $500.
> (b) That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages he may earn to his grandparents, parents, wife, sister, or children.

That all applies to foreign ships. Listen to this:

> (c) That no allotment shall be valid unless signed by and approved by the shipping commissioner. It shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine such allotments and the parties to them and enforce compliance with the law.

How could the shipping commissioner in this country enforce compliance with such law when the agreements were made in a foreign country between citizens of two foreign countries or two citizens of the same country?

Now, I do not know that I have any objections to such rules for American citizens, but here is the way section 10 ends:

> (e) That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for similar violation.

Now, then, take this case: Suppose an English shipowner makes a contract with an English subject to make a round trip on an English vessel, and he advances him a portion of his wages. Are we going to say as soon as that ship comes into our port that it shall be a crime and that the man who did it is subject to imprisonment, and that you can tie up that vessel while the matter is being investigated; and if the officer of the vessel is found guilty that we shall imprison him in this country for six months for making a legal contract in his own country with a citizen of that country?

Go still further and suppose an English shipowner makes a contract with a German subject, a contract that is legal in both countries. Are we going to say that contract shall be a crime when they come into American ports and that we will take from a foreign ship these foreigners and imprison them for making it? Upon what theory can we justify it? If it was in any way affecting the safe navigation of the vessel, if it affected directly the interests of any American citizen, I can see how we might possibly attempt to justify ourselves in such action. But are we going to do this without any reason except that we do not believe that these foreign nations are not properly treating their own sailors? Do you think any self-respecting nation is going to permit us to say what is and what is not a legal contract made in their own country between two of their own citizens, or permit us to punish their subjects for the making of such contract? I think we would be assuming a big and dangerous undertaking; and even if we carried it out it would benefit no one.

Mr. HOBSON. I was going to ask the gentleman if he had looked up the question of possible retaliation from foreign powers.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I have not.

Mr. HOBSON. And the possible restrictions that they make upon American seamen in their ports?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I have not, because I have never been able to believe that Congress would pass any bill containing such absurd and dangerous legislation as this.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think if the gentleman will take the time to study the statute to which this is an amendment he will find that it only relates to contracts made in American ports and not to contracts abroad.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It does not so show on the face of the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Study the statute it amends if you want to get an intelligent view of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Regardless of what the statute may now be, if you enact this bill it does make such contracts made abroad illegal just the same as if made in this country. If it is intended to limit this bill to contracts made in American ports the bill should so state.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it does.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, then, I want to call the attention of the House to the most important section in the bill, in my judgment, section 12:

SEC. 12. That no vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers, are of a rating not less than able seaman—

I call attention to that expression of "not less than able seaman"—

Provided, That no such vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively—

So that this portion of the bill applies to all vessels except those which are excluded—shall not be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seamen or higher.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Further it says:

No person shall be rated as an able seaman unless he is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. Any person may make application to any board of local inspectors for a certificate of service as able seaman, and upon proof being made to said board by affidavit, under rule approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, showing the nationality of the applicant and the vessel or vessels on which he has had service and that he has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes, the board of local inspectors shall issue to said applicant a certificate of service, which shall be retained by him and be accepted as prima facie evidence of his rating as an able seaman.

Now, I want to explain this expression "able seaman." I want it distinctly understood that I am in favor of doing anything that will increase the safety of life at sea, but I contend under that provision that it will not in any way increase the efficiency of the men who handle lifeboats.

Now, to start with, as I understand, the crew upon a vessel is divided into three parts—those in the engine room, those in the steward's department, and those on deck. Those upon the deck are called "able seamen." Am I right about that, Captain?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But the term "able seaman" in itself means nothing, so far as the man being able to man a lifeboat is concerned, or any small boat or any of the equipment for life-saving at sea in time of emergency. An "able seaman" may not know any more, after three years' service at sea, in actually handling a lifeboat than if he had spent those three years in plowing corn. It is in the hearings that a captain, who was at the time an officer of the vessels, made seven trips around the Horn and never saw a lifeboat launched.

Now, if "able seaman" meant that the man knew something about the handling of a lifeboat, if it meant what it seems to mean on its face, that he was experienced in seamanship, that he knew how to handle a lifeboat, I would be entirely willing that this provision should be made. But the "able seaman," going upon one of the modern steamships, does what? When the steamer goes out he helps to haul in the gangplank and put down the hatches and such things as that. He washes the deck, and paints the woodwork, and polishes the brasswork, and does other work, but he never handles a boat or an oar, and he might be three years at sea or on the Great Lakes and know nothing whatever about the handling of a small boat. As a matter of fact, the only experience that any of the crew have in any department on these great steamers is that secured by means of the drill required by law, and they drill the steward's department and the firemen's department just the same as they do the "able seamen" on deck.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In a moment. As a matter of fact, so far as the hearings go and so far as I have been able to ascertain by talking to the seamen, the firemen know more about the handling of a rowboat than do the "able seamen," and make better lifeboat crews, the difference being that as a rule they are stronger and younger men than the "able seamen." They all get the same training, and that is one reason why I make objection to the report that has been filed by the majority in regard to this bill. They cite a long list of vessels in the back of this report, and then they give the lifeboats and tell the number of men who are sent to each lifeboat, the department of the vessel to which they belong, and then end up by saying there are very few seamen in these boats, thereby giving the impression that only the "able seamen" are competent to handle the lifeboats when, as a matter of fact, the fireman or the cook or the waiter on the vessel is generally just as good seamen as the deck hands.

The "able seaman" does not know anything more about handling a boat than does the cook or the fireman. It being true that the "able seaman" knows no more about it than the fireman and the cook and those in the steward's department, why should you limit it to "able seaman" when a man goes to get a position upon a vessel, under the claim of protecting life at sea and protecting property? Why should it be limited to "able seamen"? Why should we not include the firemen, who know just as much about it as the seamen, or the men in any other department?

I am going to offer an amendment, and I hope the gentlemen on that side will accept it. I am going to offer an amendment to add to the definition of "able seaman" this qualification, that he shall satisfy the local inspector that he is capable of handling a lifeboat. No man ought to be permitted to go as an "able seaman" unless he has that ability and experience. I say the gentleman in charge of this bill will not go any further than I will in protecting life and property at sea, but I am opposed to passing legislation here in favor of any one class of people unless it is to the advantage of the public to do it.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says that the occasions where seamen have handled boats are on the drills which they have?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; on these great steam vessels.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; on these great vessels. Now, does not the gentleman believe that a seaman having three years' experience with these drills would be much more competent to handle one of these lifeboats than would a man fresh from the land service who had never been at sea?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He probably would, but again he might not. There are men to-day who have been three years on one of these great steamers who, except for the fact that they are less liable to seasickness than new men would be, know no more about the handling of a boat than does the man who, as I said a moment ago, has worked in a cornfield.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. One of the requirements or purposes of this bill is to have them trained or drilled, so that they will know more.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, that is one of the purposes of the bill, but it did not get in the bill. That is the difficulty. If the gentlemen who have charge of the bill had permitted a little more study to be made of it, and had let the minority members attend the subcommittee meetings, they would not have made some of the mistakes that have been made in the drafting of this bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that there has been a careful study of this bill by the committee for the past 16 or 18 years.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, that is all true enough; but as to this particular bill, in the way it is written now, I never saw it until it was reported to the committee by the subcommittee, and, according to my recollection, it was reported out of the full committee within 10 minutes after it was called up. I had never read it through and never had a chance to read it through before it was reported.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say to the gentleman that this bill was prepared before the Titanic disaster. That disaster has brought sharply to the public attention the necessity for the use of lifeboats and familiarity on the part of seamen with lifeboats. So far as I am concerned, I shall have no objection to adopting the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I shall be very glad to have the gentleman's assistance, and I hope every man in this House will join with me and define an "able seaman" so it will mean something. I hope instead of saying "service on deck at sea" we will say "service at sea," because a fireman is just as good a sailor as the man on deck. Let us get as many good men on these vessels as we can. Instead of saying "on deck" let us say "at sea," and with the additional provision that he shall know how to handle a lifeboat. Then you will have competent men on your vessels. Let us enact a law that will make the words "able seaman" mean what it once did—that he is a man trained in seamanship; that he is capable of handling a lifeboat; that his experience and character is such as to guarantee that in an emergency he will give first-class service in saving life and property at sea.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman investigated the laws of other nations with reference to the term "able seamen," and has he found any such qualification or definition as he suggests put in any definition of an able seaman anywhere in the world?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I have not, and it does not make any difference. I know the term "able seaman" as it used to be. There are no able seamen now under the old definition, and whether they exist or not, now is the time to define the term. It will not do any harm.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the gentleman rather of the opinion that under the definition he would make now he would find no able seamen at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No. Every man who has been running upon these steamers for the last three years in the fireman's department or steward's department or on deck can qualify as an able seaman; and, as I said awhile ago, I decidedly object to passing a bill here that discriminates against the firemen and the other departments in favor of the men on deck, because they are all equally competent to handle lifeboats, and they are all entitled to the same consideration. This bill attempts to limit "able seamen" to the deck department, regardless of the fact that the other departments have just as competent seamen.

Under the definition I propose for "able seamen" the number would not only be more than doubled, but they would be "able seamen" in fact, and not as now, perhaps, only in name.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman understand that section 12 excludes from this service those employed on inland waterways?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It excludes from service anybody except a man who has had three years' experience at sea on deck, or on the Great Lakes. I am glad the gentleman has made the suggestion to me. The bill as now drawn excludes fishermen, and they are the best sailors in the world. There is no other who can possibly compare with the fishermen in that respect, but under this bill unless a man complied with the definition of an able seaman he could not go on deck as a sailor, and fishermen, the best boatmen in the world, would be excluded.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to section 2, which provides for the steamboat service on the Mississippi River. In addition to that I also call his attention to the fact that on the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays and other large bodies of water in the United States there are men who are certainly able seamen.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to the language test. If it was proposed to limit the language that shall be spoken upon American ships I think that is a proposition that might profitably be considered, but here we say that a Japanese vessel shall carry only Japanese crews. When a vessel comes into the port of Seattle from Japan, her Japanese crew can demand the wages then due them and then desert. They do desert. Japanese sailors have become Americanized in that particular.

Mr. MADDEN. How about the Chinese?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Chinese sailors do not desert, first, because they are watched, and, further, a Chinaman almost universally regards his contract. If a Chinaman makes an agreement that he will go the round trip, he will go the round trip; but the Japanese sailor deserts. Now, suppose a Japanese ship comes into an American port and the crew desert, as they have every inducement to do under this bill. Then that vessel is not permitted to depart from that port under penalties prescribed until it gets a Japanese crew who can understand the Japanese language. Where are they going to get that crew of Japanese? One of our vessels goes over to Japan and the crew deserts. That vessel has to get an American crew there. The same is true of Germany, of England, of all the countries of the world that come to our ports; they must have a crew that speaks the language of its officers or they will not be granted clearance papers.

Now, as we have but 10 ships on the deep sea, and have but a few sailors in the world, does it become this country of ours that has not had enough wisdom to get a merchant marine of her own, or had enough wisdom to keep the flag on the ocean, to pass an act without entering into negotiation with the other nations of the world, without any notice to them to tell them what contracts they shall make with their sailors, how they shall pay them, what men they shall employ, what language they shall speak, and what tests shall be made of their efficiency? We do all this for all. The provisions I have just read apply to the foreign sailor and foreign ships. No good can come from the passage of such law and no self-respecting nation will submit to it. We have no right to say to other nations how they shall conduct their business when it does not affect American interests.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman believe that the United States has a perfect right to pass a law to regulate ships in its own ports, whether the ship belongs to foreign countries or to its own country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will admit that the Nation has the power under certain conditions, I will not say the right.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I can not yield until I get through with this section. Now, I call attention of Members of the House to this paragraph:

> The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any citizen of the United States setting forth that this section is not being complied with—

That is, the contracts, language test, the experience the crew shall have, all these various requirements I have just read—> cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine the fact; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section.

Now, what does that mean? We have to-day a strike of the sailors on some of our ships in the port of New York and some of the other eastern ports. As to the merits of that strike I know nothing whatever; I am taking it simply as an illustration. Suppose to-day we had on the statute books this provision, any American citizen could tie up every vessel that comes into the port of the city of New York.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not just now. Because it says that any American citizen may file an affidavit which shall cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to determine these facts: Whether they speak the right language, to see if they have made contracts for advanced payments, to see if they are able seamen, and to see if two able seamen are provided for each lifeboat—all the various provisions just read. I asked Gen. Uhler the other day how long it would take to cause a muster of one of these crews.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He estimated the time all the way from 5 to 24 hours, to go through and make the examination. Now, is that a safe power to place in any man's hands?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In a moment. I want to call attention to the further fact that there is no penalty for the man that may make a false affidavit. He may make any affidavit he pleases. A great passenger vessel, with thousands of people on board, carrying the United States mails, every hour worth thousands of dollars, just ready to sail, and here comes a man with an affidavit and ties up the vessel perhaps a day or more. I do not think that is fair legislation. I do not think it is just to the public or just to the shipowner or to anybody. I do not think the seamen want any such law. I can not believe that any fair-minded man is in favor of this section as it stands.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the British Board of Trade has that power?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, the board of trade, yes; but this puts it in the hands of any American citizen.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true, but the British Board of Trade acts on the complaints of the British subject.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But you say any American citizen may compel a muster of the crew. Now, suppose, for an illustration, that a man wanted to tie up the shipping in the port of New York. All that he has to do is to file an affidavit in regard to every vessel that comes into port. There is no penalty whatever if the affidavit is false. He could have the affidavits ready, and one man alone could tie up all the shipping of all countries that came into the port of New York.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no penalty except the penalty that generally applies to false swearing or perjury. The same laws that apply to perjury in other cases would apply to this.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not my distinguished friend is a lawyer, although he has a very good legal mind, but I will say to him that he is probably aware of the fact that an affidavit is not perjury unless it is expressly made so by statute.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman objects to this bill because it undertakes in the United States to interfere with contracts legal in the country in which they are made. Does not the gentleman very strenuously advocate the passage of a law which would forbid the entrance into our ports of foreign vessels because they have made combinations that might be legal in their own country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; but I would not place it in the power of any one citizen to do it. I simply am in favor of it after they have had a trial in court and the decree has been entered up finding them guilty not of violating a law made between themselves, but of violating a law of this country directly affecting the interests of this country.

Mr. HARDY. Again, it is not the principle, but the manner of its exercise to which the gentleman objects.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have no objection to making foreign ships obey the law, but I do not believe in placing it in the power of one man to destroy the shipping business of this country.

At the proper time, if the section stays in, I shall offer an amendment making a false affidavit perjury and prescribing suitable punishment therefor.

There is just one other section to which I desire to call attention, and then I shall be through, and that is section 13, which is as follows:

SEC. 13. That every sailing or steam vessel shall carry in her crew a boy or boys, native of the United States, or one whose father or mother is a naturalized citizen of the United States, as follows: If she be 300 registered tons or more, but less than 1,500 registered tons, at least one boy; if she be 1,500 tons register or more, at least two boys or apprentices. Any vessel leaving any port of the United States without the boy or boys required by this section shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each offense: Provided, That this penalty shall not apply if, after reasonable diligence, the boy or boys required by this section could not be obtained

My objection to that section is that it does not mean anything—absolutely nothing. A boy is not required to do anything. The shipowners are not required to teach him anything. They are not required to pay him anything. That section is simply nothing; only that much writing on a piece of paper, signifying nothing. I am in favor of the American boy going to sea, and if we are going to have a provision of that kind, let us have one that means something, one that will require American boys to be trained in seamanship.

I desire to say just one word in regard to the "able-seamen" clause as affecting the Great Lakes. If you adopt this provision in regard to "able seamen" and require two able seamen at each lifeboat, on a great many American vessels you will double the crew, and on some of them you will increase it three times. These men will have nothing to do whatever except to occupy space and wait for a possible disaster when they will be called upon to handle a lifeboat. There is no need of these extra "able seamen" even to handle lifeboats, because you have your firemen's and your stewards' departments, and the men there are as capable of handling a lifeboat as the "able seaman." I will give you one illustration. There is a vessel on Puget Sound called the Camano, which runs from Everett to an island a few miles distant. Under the recent regulations adopted since the sinking of the Titanic, that vessel would have to carry either 10 or 12 lifeboats during the wintertime. She has a maximum capacity of 180 passengers. She is never more than a few minutes from shore. Her entire crew consists of six men. Under this bill this little passenger vessel, with six men in her crew, would be compelled to carry 16 or 20 men on deck alone for the sole purpose of handling the lifeboats. The occasion for the use of all of them would not arise once a century. This in a varying degree would be true upon all vessels in the coastwise and lake traffic.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is through, will he yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In reference to section 1 of the bill, it provides for the number of hours of labor while a vessel is in port, and then provides:

Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section the seamen shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and shall, upon demand, receive wages then earned.

Would it be practical under that by collusion to obtain entry into the United States of foreigners who under the immigration laws could not get in?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I made that suggestion and asked a member of the Committee on Immigration to study that point. The gentleman is here now. I do not know whether he gave it his attention or not. As far as I am concerned I am not prepared to say.

I desire to call attention to this one other point made by the people upon the Pacific coast about paying wages in every port touched. In a vessel running from Seattle to Alaska, the vessel would stop at Ketchikan, and there the seamen would be entitled to one-half of their wages. It would then go on to Skagway, and there they could demand half of what was left, and so from port to port so that very little would be left when it arrived at its final destination. It is claimed that this is a very great inducement for seamen to desert in Alaskan ports, as good jobs are usually easy to find. Under this bill the shipowner claims that it would be practically impossible to maintain good service to Alaska during the summer months.

I thank the House for its patience and consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I would ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how many speeches he has on that side?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I can not tell at the present time; some gentlemen who are not present now have spoken to me.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have only one more on our side and I would be very glad if the gentleman would consume the balance of his time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I ask how much time has been consumed on either side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 21 minutes left and the gentleman from Missouri 62 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The gentleman had better consume some of his time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We want to get through by 6 o'clock and Mr. WILSON is going to cut his remarks short.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, so far as abolishing the punishment for desertion is concerned, there has not been a time in the last five years that a bill of that kind would not have been reported unanimously from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. So far as increasing the safety at sea is concerned or improving conditions for the seaman, I want to say to the gentlemen on that side of the aisle that I will join with them in any bill that will do that; and when we come to the reading of this bill for amendment under the five-minute rule, I have several amendments that I desire to offer which will tend to increase the safety at sea and also to help the sailor, and I want you gentlemen to join me and we will see whether this bill is really introduced for that purpose or not.

The two gentlemen from California [Mr. KENT and Mr. RAKER] came forward to indorse this bill. Whether they intended to indorse all of it I do not know, but I desire them to understand that if they do they are not working for the benefit of the American sailor but for the Japanese sailor.

This bill will help to drive the few remaining American ships from the sea. It is certain that every American vessel on the Pacific, unless it is the line that has just started to run under the subsidy act of 1891, would soon go under a foreign flag. The great vessels of the Pacific Mail that have so long and against such odds carried the Stars and Stripes on the Pacific will haul down that banner immediately after this bill is written on the statute books and take the flag of Japan, and so will the Minnesota, that has the distinction of being the only unsubsidized American vessel afloat running in the foreign overseas trade. But this is only a portion of the injury that will come to the Pacific coast. All foreign vessels in the deep-sea trade that now come to Seattle and Tacoma and other Puget Sound ports will certainly leave these ports and make Vancouver, British Columbia, a terminus. Do you suppose that these foreign vessels are going to submit to the foolish, unreasonable, burdensome, and even insulting regulations made by this country if this bill should pass when they can escape them all in a port just as convenient for them in all things in a country where treaty regulations and national comity are observed? Why should these foreign vessels come to Seattle, where their crews can demand their pay, where they can desert without fear, where any American citizen by the mere filing of an affidavit without any fear of punishment, if such affidavit be false, can indefinitely delay them in their departure for any voyage? Who will be benefited by this being done, by driving these vessels under foreign flags and to foreign ports? Absolutely no one. There are no American sailors upon the Pacific Ocean in the deep-sea trade, either upon American ships, except its officers, or upon foreign ships. We would add all this burden to American commerce, to American shipping, without benefiting a single American citizen.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. For a question; yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does it make any difference to us whether the flag is the Japanese or the American if the crew is all Japanese?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I know that the gentleman has said that a great many times. So far as I am concerned, as long as every other vessel on the Pacific Ocean employs oriental crews, under every other flag, I would rather have the American vessels remain under the American flag, employ American officers, pay them American wages, and be at the call of this country in time of war than to force them under the Japanese flag without in any way benefiting anyone but Japan.

I deem it especially unfortunate just at this time that hostile legislation to American shipping should be agitated. With the opening of the Panama Canal, with the hope of that canal free for American ships, American shipping is enjoying a prosperity it has not known for 50 years. In addition to the canal there are other causes that are helping to revive this industry. The shipbuilder to-day is getting most of his material for less than his foreign competitor, notably his steel.

Many other facts have recently been brought to light also that have given the friends of American shipping encouragement. The Merchant Marine League of Cleveland, Ohio, had for some years made a most earnest and in many ways a successful fight looking to the upbuilding of our merchant marine, but in making this fight it had antagonized some interests and made some enemies, I regret to say, even in the Halls of Congress. About two years ago a resolution was adopted in the House that called for an investigation of the methods of this league. The result of that investigation was as surprising to its enemies as it was gratifying to its friends. No selfish motive was found for the activity of this league, but, on the contrary, its interest was proven to be entirely disinterested and patriotic. While this fact pleased all those who had indorsed its work or who had been associated with it, the result following this investigation was much more valuable and far-reaching. The original purpose of that investigation was soon practically forgotten. The energetic secretary of the league soon began to furnish evidence of conditions that were far more interesting to the committee and to the country than the unfortunate personal controversy in which he had become involved with some Members of Congress.

This investigation gave him the opportunity to reach the public and to prove to the country what he had long asserted to be the fact, that the regular foreign shipping lines that come into the ports of this country, both upon the Atlantic and the Pacific, that carried 97 per cent of our shipping were all formed into pools, conferences, rings, and combines; that these lines fix freight and passenger rates from the ports of this country to all the ports of the world by agreement; that there was not the slightest competition between these lines. These facts were so clearly demonstrated by the evidence there produced that since that time not even the subsidized newspapers in this country that had especially defended these combinations have dared deny them. It stands to-day as a fact admitted by everyone who has given the matter consideration.

It was at this hearing that the secretary of the league for the first time brought to public attention in this country the report of the royal commission on shipping rings made by the British Parliament. This report, by the admission of the foreign shipowners themselves, fully proved every statement that the secretary of the league had made concerning this monopoly of foreign ships. This same hearing also uncovered some of the many iniquities practiced by the conference of foreign ships that completely monopolize the trade between this country and South America. There was brought to the attention of the public the condition in relation to the coffee trade especially, a subject that has since been considerably exploited and exposed by Members of Congress and by the press. Original written rebate contracts in regard to this coffee trade, in direct violation of the antitrust law of this country, between New York merchants and this South American conference, were produced before the committee and copies published in the hearing. Upon the evidence secured at this hearing I made a speech on the floor of the House, and the facts that I stated in relation to this foreign steamship combine attracted attention throughout the entire country. This investigation also largely brought out the facts that has caused the Government to bring the suits now pending to dissolve these foreign shipping combines and to prevent them from entering our ports if they are convicted of violating our antitrust laws. It was also largely upon the facts uncovered at this hearing that led me to introduce in the House a bill to prohibit any vessel the use of our ports if it was found to belong to one of these illegal combinations.

This bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and a few days ago, after considerable discussion, passed the House by unanimous consent. The facts brought out at that investigation have interested the public to such an extent that it will eventually cause the destruction of the giant foreign shipping monopoly that has grown rich by levying its unearned millions upon American commerce. Fate, like Providence, if they be not one and the same, "often moves in mysterious ways its wonders to perform." By this attack upon the Merchant Marine League the opportunity was given it to do more effective work for the cause for which it had so long been fighting than ever before. This opportunity was quickly seized upon and used to the fullest extent by the efficient and patriotic secretary of the league, Mr. John A. Penton, of Cleveland.

With some knowledge of the work that has been done in this country for the last decade in behalf of our merchant marine, I pay to Mr. Penton only a well-deserved and well-earned tribute when I say that he has done more within the last few years than any other man in America to create a public sentiment in favor of restoring the American flag to the sea.

The Titanic disaster is referred to in the report on this bill. It was to be expected that this awful calamity would be used as an argument in favor of this legislation. But there is nothing in that sudden and awful tragedy, that shocked a civilized world, that gives any reason for the passage of this bill. There was no showing that this vessel was not sufficiently manned or that her crew was not competent. Neither is there any evidence that if her entire crew had been so-called "able seamen" that the result would have been any different or that an additional life would have been saved. Indeed, the truth is that in those hours of awful peril and panic the fact that so many were saved was due largely to the brave and heroic efforts of her passengers. To them belongs the greatest credit. That the Titanic was not efficiently equipped is unfortunately true. It is also true that not another instance of a great ship sinking in a perfectly quiet sea will probably occur again in a thousand years. It is also true that under ordinary circumstances—that is, an ordinarily rough sea—that lifeboats would have been absolutely useless. If any officer should attempt to use them in a rough sea, except at the last moment and as a last resort, he would be guilty of a crime. But, notwithstanding that fact, let us require that all over-sea vessels be equipped with lifeboats sufficient to handle all persons that she may ever have on board.

The speed at which the Titanic traveled was inexcusable. The method of her construction was monstrously criminal. In the construction of the Titanic is the foundation of the tragedy. She was not better equipped for saving life because it was believed that there could not arise any necessity for such equipment. She was sent at tremendous speed in dangerous waters in spite of repeated warnings because it was believed that she was unsinkable. The primary crime in connection with that unparalleled disaster of the sea was the faulty building of the ship. Not in faulty plans, but in faulty construction. I have taken occasion to talk with expert constructors in regard to this disaster, and they all assure me that the vessel was not properly built; that the work was not properly done; that the vessel was not properly inspected and tested. It is said, as a fact, that her water-tight bulkheads were never properly tried, and if they had been that their weakness and worthlessness would have been demonstrated.

Naval experts have assured me that if the Titanic had been so constructed as to pass the naval test prescribed by this country in the construction of our vessels that the injury she received would not have sunk her. They assure me that there is not a vessel on the ocean constructed upon plans that have been approved by our Navy Department that would have been sunk by a similar injury. All American vessels crossing the Atlantic to-day were constructed upon plans approved by the Secretary of the Navy. For 20 years the American line of vessels so constructed has not lost a passenger nor even a mail sack. There is an illustration of real safety at sea, and this safety is largely to be found in the construction of the vessel and not in the equipments and provisions made to save life and property when the vessel is wrecked.

The construction of a nonsinkable vessel is not impossible. It will soon be accomplished. It would be wrong, indeed, to discourage attempts in this direction because of the faulty construction and the criminal and negligent inspection that caused the Titanic not to be so.

In the shadow of that great calamity, in sympathy and in hysteria, all kind of plans have been proposed to prevent such disasters in the future, and almost everybody has been condemned for what occurred. Bills of merit and bills without merit have been introduced in Congress with the supposed intent of producing greater safety at sea. Some of them were sincere in purpose and some, I regret to say, were intended only to secure a little newspaper notoriety. It is worthy of attention that we condemn everybody but ourselves. But does Congress stand blameless for this great tragedy? Are we without fault when we have placed ourselves where we can only compel other nations to properly equip their vessels to protect our own citizens and find it impossible to compel proper construction in the first place? Has Congress honestly tried in the last few years to bring about a condition of highest safety at sea for American citizens and American interests? Congress has repeatedly failed in recent years to increase the pay under the act of 1891 that would have given us American vessels on the high seas that would not have gone down under such injury as that received by the Titanic. If we had provided such ships we could at least have had the satisfaction of knowing that we had done our full duty to protect American lives and American property at sea. But Congress has always failed to do this for fear, forsooth, that some American citizen might make too much money for the sake, as claimed, of saving a few paltry dollars. The sum total of all that we would have paid if all these bills had been written upon our statute books is not for a moment to be weighed against a single one of the many noble lives that were sacrificed when the Titanic went to her doom. Since we have failed to perform this high duty to American citizens and to American interests and have intrusted it to foreign nations it hardly becomes us to grow hysterical over their failure to properly perform it and in denouncing them attempt to conceal our own neglect. In other words, if we are to have the greatest safety at sea we can only secure it by building, equipping, owning, and running our own vessels.

Again, we can never get American sailors upon the sea until we get American ships upon the sea. We can not have sailors without ships. What we need to-day is fewer laws upon our statute books and more ships upon the ocean.

We have now more laws and fewer vessels than any other great nation of the world. All other countries constantly struggle to upbuild their merchant marine. We continually strive to destroy ours, and this bill is another and a long step in that direction. Some day we will awake to the costly folly of sending out of this country—of paying to other nations—more than a quarter of a billion dollars annually to carry our commerce, of paying that vast sum mostly to labor for work that should be done by American labor. Some day we will pay more fully than we have already done the fearful penalty of placing the life of our citizens and the carrying of our commerce and the prosperity and the safety of our country in the care and keeping of other nations. Let us hope that some day before we learn it in the awful lesson of war that Congress will awake to the necessity for action in reference to this matter. Let us hope that some day not far distant Congress will forget parties and partisanship, politics and prejudice, and cowardice and sectionalism, and remember only our country and our country's good and will pass a law, not to destroy, but to upbuild our merchant marine, a law that will give us safety at sea, a law that will give us American sailors, a law that will cause our ships once more to traverse all the highways on the ocean, and the Stars and Stripes once more to fly in all the ports of the world.

As I said a few moments ago, I am willing to join the gentlemen upon that side of the House in doing anything that will protect life at sea, but I do hope that in going through this bill that it will be considered by the House, and that proper amendments will be adopted for that purpose.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. AYRES. To return to the gentleman's statement about putting the American flag upon the sea again, what kind of laws would the gentleman suggest which would build up the American merchant marine?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I thought everybody in this House and a good many people throughout the United States knew my views upon that question. I have occupied so much of the time of the House in trying to state them and written so many articles for magazines trying to tell my position that I am astonished if the gentleman does not know.

Mr. AYRES. Well, a twice-told tale is interesting.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I can tell the gentleman in a moment what I would do to build up the American merchant marine. I would do what every nation upon the earth has done that has a merchant marine. I would follow the example of those people who have made a success and placed their flags upon the seas and not attempt to return to something that is obsolete and long since discarded by every civilized nation in the world. I refer to free ships, a policy that has been discarded; I refer to subsidizing the mail lines for carrying the mails of the country as a policy of success. I might say to the gentleman, which he probably knows, that there is not a first-class vessel upon any ocean under any flag to-day carrying mails for any government upon schedule time but what receives a subsidy from that government, and how do we expect, with our high-priced labor, with the high cost of operation of ships, without paying any subsidy, to do what no other nation has been able to do with cheap ships and cheap labor? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to supplement the remarks of the gentleman who has just closed in regard to the rating of able seamen, which seems to be in the minds of the committee an important matter upon the question of boat handling in case of wreck. I hope the gentleman will so amend the measure that the expression "able seamen" will not be left in this bill with its old maritime significance. It would prevent the taking into the service of lots of young men who along our seaboard States have been upon the water, have learned to hand, knot, reef, and steer and the actual handling of a boat in any kind of weather who yet have not been at sea on deck for three years and yet who want to go into the merchant service and who would be most competent men, in fact no better men could be found to handle boats at sea than just those men, and still they would be unable to qualify. I could go from the point of Florida to Eastport, Me., and find men who can handle lifeboats better than most men who go to sea who have never had three years' sea service on deck. They are used to boats and these young men are men who want to enter the service and ultimately get the rank of able seamen and who would probably never enlist in the merchant service under this bill. Take the men along the shores of Cape Cod, along the shores of New Jersey, who handle lifeboats, and possibly some who are in the Life-Saving Service. There is the sort of men who can handle a lifeboat, and when we are agitated about the Titanic disaster we want to remember that accident occurred under conditions which were remarkable. It was a great disaster at sea but you had a smooth sea with a chance to get your boats out, and if they had had the ordinary motion of the water at sea there would not have been 1 boat in 10 of those that would have gotten away safely.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not one of them.

Mr. HARRIS. Especially where they had to be lowered 70 feet to the water, and it is not the man who serves three years on a deck of a steamer but it is the man who has spent all of his time, perhaps from his boyhood, in handling small craft in the rough waters of the coast but who can not rate as able seamen under the provisions of the bill, and I hope that language will be amended to cover those cases.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19403. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics on cotton.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 23515. An act granting pensions and increases of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 17239. An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 20501. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange the site heretofore acquired for a United States immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for another suitable site, and to pay, if necessary, out of the appropriation heretofore made for said immigration station, an additional sum in accomplishing such exchange; or to sell the present site, the money procured from such sale to revert to the appropriation made for said immigration station, and to purchase another site in lieu thereof; and

H. J. Res. 220. Joint resolution to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared recently in the American Anti-Socialist on the subject of socialism, together with the list of books on the subject of socialism.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know I should object to the request if the request was made so that anyone could hear what the gentleman says or if the Chair would state what the request is.

Mr. RAINEY. It is to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared recently in the Anti-Socialist on the subject of socialism, together with a list of books on the subject of socialism. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Executive," on page 2, after line 16, to insert:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $225,000.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to pass over the first amendment to the bill, and I ask the Secretary to proceed to state the next amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to pass over the first amendment on page 2, beginning in line 17. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under the Treasury Department," subhead "Public buildings," on page 9, line 15, after the word "limit," to strike out the sum "$1,000" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the clause read:

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand, by unanimous consent we are now considering only committee amendments.

Mr. WARREN. We are now considering committee amendments. That is all we have to consider, because the reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is whether other amendments can now be offered.

Mr. WARREN. I think we should first consider the amendments of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. I myself think so, but the way we have been doing is rather informal, and, therefore, I make this inquiry. I do not know whether we are going to first consider committee amendments, as we formerly have been doing, or whether the bill is now subject to all amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I will say, for the information of the Senate, that the chairman prefers to go on through with the committee amendments, including such small formal matters which have since been submitted to the committee, as may be reached in the reading of the bill. When that is done, the bill will be open to amendment by all Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am in perfect accord with that, and I merely wanted to have an understanding about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 16, after the word "repairs," to strike out the sum "$440,000" and insert "$465,000," so as to make the clause read:

Mechanical equipment for public building: For heating, hoisting, plumbing, gas piping, ventilating, and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, vacuum cleaning systems, interior pneumatic-tube, conduit, wiring, call-bell, and signal systems and repairs to the same, for all public buildings, including buildings not reserved by the vendors on sites acquired for buildings or the enlargement of buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, and including not exceeding $40,000 for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, and not exceeding $9,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings, at Washington, D. C., and including not exceeding $10,000 for maintenance, changes in and repairs of pneumatic-tube system between the appraiser's warehouse at Greenwich, Christopher, Washington, and Barrow Streets and the new customhouse in Bowling Green, Borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, including repairs to the street pavement and subsurface necessarily incident to or resulting from such maintenance, changes, or repairs, $465,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 3, after the word "Massachusetts," to strike out "$17,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

Electrical protection to vaults, public buildings: For installation and maintenance of electrical burglar-alarm devices authorized by the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1903, including the post office and courthouse at Chicago, Ill., and the post office and subtreasury at Boston, Mass., $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask at this time unanimous consent that the Secretary in completing the bill shall be authorized to correct all totals so that they may represent the sum of the various amendments adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 16, after the word "exceeding," to strike out the sum "$142,920" and insert "$144,700," so as to read:

General expenses of public buildings: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute and give effect to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat., p. 537, pt. 1): For additional salary of $1,000 for the Supervising Architect of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1913, for the specific salaries for the personal services in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, set forth under said office in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913 (not exceeding $144,700).

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "General expenses of public buildings," on page 26, line 25, before the words "per annum," to strike out "$2,200" and insert "$2,500," so as to read:

For compensation of computers and estimators, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "General expenses of public buildings," on page 28, line 16, after the sum "$656,920," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That hereafter members of the field force of the office of the Supervising Architect, including supervising superintendents, superintendents, junior superintendents, and inspectors of the several classes, may be detailed to the District of Columbia for temporary duty in connection with the office of the Supervising Architect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 6, to strike out:

The act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain plans and specifications for public buildings to be erected under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and providing for local supervision of the construction of the same," approved February 20, 1893, commonly known as the Tarsney Act, is repealed: Provided, That contracts heretofore entered into under said act shall not be affected by this repeal, and architectural services rendered under such contracts shall be paid for from the appropriation for "Architectural competitions, public buildings," available at the time payment for the particular service rendered is due.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that amendment proposes to repeal the Tarsney Act. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why that is proposed?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is proposed by the House to repeal that act.

Mr. REED. The statement of amendments is proceeding so rapidly that I did not understand the amendment. I am informed this amendment restores the Tarsney Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Life-Saving Service," on page 32, line 9, to increase the appropriation for pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations, including the old Chicago station, etc., from $1,960,000 to $2,031,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Revenue-Cutter Service," on page 32, line 15, after the word "engineers," to insert "two civilian instructors," so as to read:

For expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service: For pay and allowances of captain commandant and officers of that rank, senior captains, captains, lieutenants, engineer in chief and officers of that rank, captains of engineers, lieutenants of engineers, two constructors, cadets, cadet engineers, two civilian instructors, and pilots employed, and rations for pilots.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for the expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service, on page 33, line 7, after the words "St. Marys River," to insert "for temporary leases and improvement of property for revenue-cutter purposes," so as to read:

For maintenance of vessels in enforcing the provisions of the acts relating to the anchorage of vessels in the ports of New York and Chicago, and in the Kennebec River, and the movements and anchorage of vessels in St. Marys River; for temporary leases and improvement of property for revenue-cutter purposes; not exceeding $5,000 for the improvement of the depot for the service at Arundel Cove, Md.; not exceeding $150 for medals for excellence in marksmanship; contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, labor, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $2,260,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 15, to strike out:

No additional appointments as cadets or cadet engineers shall be made in the Revenue-Cutter Service unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the meaning of that? The words stricken out are:

No additional appointments as cadets or cadet engineers shall be made in the Revenue-Cutter Service unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there seemed to be a move, which did not have momentum enough to carry it through, to do away with the Revenue-Cutter Service, and consequently these lines were put in by the other House. Subsequent consideration of that matter, certainly the consideration given to it by the committee of the Senate, seemed to indicate that the time had not come to do away with the Revenue-Cutter Service, so we struck those lines out in order that the conferees on the part of the Senate may compare the information they have with the information the other House has, to see whether or not that provision should be retained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to offer an amendment, on behalf of the committee, to the paragraph now under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$2,260,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,280,000."

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire is that for the purpose of correcting a total?

Mr. WARREN. No; that covers an addition. The matter was overlooked in some of the papers when we were preparing the bill; it is an addition of $20,000 to the amount for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that estimated for?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; in fact, more than that was estimated for. There is also $10,000 to be added in the next item.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the reason for adding that $20,000 to the item of $2,260,000?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator wishes we can refer back to the papers, but it is a clear case. If they are to pay all the stated accounts that must be paid, the additional amount will be required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I also offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "$165,000" and insert "$175,000," so as to read:

For repairs to revenue cutters, $175,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Engraving and Printing," on page 35, after line 4, to insert:

Hereafter the proviso of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stats. L., 604), directing that all bonds, notes, and checks shall be printed on hand-roller presses shall not apply to checks, the backs and tints of all United States bonds, the backs and tints of all United States paper money, and the backs and tints of bonds and paper money issued by any of the insular possessions of the United States, any or all of which shall be printed from intaglio plates and on such plate printing presses as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, said presses to be operated by plate printers, except that checks and tints may be printed by any desired process: Provided, That the backs of all United States paper money shall be printed from four-subject plates, and the faces of all internal-revenue stamps now printed from intaglio plates on hand-roller or power plate printing presses shall continue to be printed from intaglio plates on hand-roller or power plate printing presses, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, said presses to be operated by plate printers: Provided further, That should the Secretary of the Treasury decide to print on the aforesaid power plate printing presses any of the classes of work hereinbefore permitted to be printed on such presses, not more than one-fifth of the total number of hand-roller presses required to produce the estimated quantity of such work in any fiscal year shall be displaced in such fiscal year: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, apply motors to hand-roller presses that are now, or may hereafter be, operated in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but such presses, if equipped with motors, shall be regarded as hand-roller presses within the meaning of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask a question. My attention was distracted. What was done with the amendment on pages 35 and 36?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should only agree to it for the reason that it is a small step in the direction of correcting a wrong existing.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous objects, Treasury Department," on page 37, line 7, after the word "violations," to strike out the sum "$140,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to read:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws: For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 9, to insert:

Special witness of destruction of United States securities: For pay of the representative of the public on the committee to witness the destruction by maceration of Government securities, at $5 per day while actually employed, $1,565.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the chairman of the committee whether that should not be so amended as to provide for a superintendent of the laundry in which the money of the United States is being laundered under the existing system. I inquire whether the word "maceration" would include that.

Mr. WARREN. That is taken care of in another place. The item that we insert here is not new, but is one which was inadvertently left out on the House side.

Mr. HEYBURN. I recognize it as not being new, but what I had in mind was the statement, I think official or semiofficial in its character, in regard to laundering the money. I believe that term is used officially.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator will find, before the completion of the bill, or if he will read it now, that that is provided for otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 22, after the word "employed," to strike out the sum "$2,450,000" and insert "$2,570,000," so as to read:

For operating force for public buildings: For the pay of such personal services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary in connection with the care, maintenance, and repair of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department (except as hereinafter provided), together with the grounds thereof and the equipment and furnishings therein, and of sites for public buildings, including assistant custodians, janitors, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen; engineers, firemen, elevator conductors, coal passers, electricians, dynamo tenders, lampists, and wiremen; and for the mechanical labor force in connection with said buildings, including carpenters, plumbers, steam fitters, machinists, and painters, but in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed, $2,570,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 25, after the word "contract," to strike out the sum "$800,000" and insert "$900,000," so as to read:

Furniture and repairs of furniture: For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and gas and electric light fixture, for all public buildings, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for furniture, carpets, gas and electric fixtures for new buildings, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 23, after the words "assay offices," to strike out the sum "$1,550,000" and insert "$1,600,000," so as to read:

Operating supplies for public buildings: For the purchase of fuel, steam, light, water, water meters, ice, lighting supplies, electric current for lighting and power purposes, telephone service for custodians' forces, removal of ashes and rubbish, snow and ice, cutting grass and weeds, washing towels, etc., and for miscellaneous items for the use of the custodians' forces in the care of public buildings and the grounds thereof, and in the care of the equipment and furnishings in such buildings: and for miscellaneous supplies for the operation (not including repairs) of the mechanical equipment, including heating, hoisting, ventilating and plumbing systems and apparatus, and electric-lighting plants for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including new buildings and the customhouse at Washington, D. C., but not including any other public building within the District of Columbia, and exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, $1,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 25, after the words "bounty laws," to insert "for purchase and exchange of typewriters," so as to read:

Suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes: For expenses incurred under the authority or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in detecting, arresting, and delivering into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money and persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and of foreign governments, as well as the coins of the United States and of foreign governments, and other felonies committed against the laws of the United States relating to the pay and bounty laws, for purchase and exchange of typewriters, and for no other purpose whatever, except in the protection of the person of the President of the United States, $135,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 19, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the National Irrigation Congress, to assist in defraying the expenses of the twentieth annual meeting of said congress, to be held at Salt Lake City, Utah, commencing September 30, 1912, $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, on page 44, line 21, the word "National" and inserting "International" in its place.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Customs Service," on page 44, line 23, after the word "customs," to strike out the sum "$4,650,000" and insert "$5,000,000," so as to read:

To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, $5,000,000, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 15, to strike out:

Section 3687 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is repealed, to take effect from and after June 30, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 19, to strike out:

The President is authorized to reorganize the customs service and cause estimates to be submitted therefor on account of the fiscal year 1914 bringing the total cost of said service for said fiscal year within a sum not exceeding $10,150,000 instead of $10,500,000, the amount authorized to be expended therefor on account of the current fiscal year 1912; in making such reorganization and reduction in expenses he is authorized to abolish or consolidate collection districts, ports, and subports of entry and delivery, to discontinue needless offices and employments, to reduce excessive rates of compensation below amounts fixed by law or Executive order, and to do all such other and further things that in his judgment may be necessary to make such organization effective and within the limit of cost herein fixed; such reorganization shall be communicated to Congress at its next regular session and shall constitute for the fiscal year 1914 and until otherwise provided by Congress the permanent organization of the customs service.

Mr. REED. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee why the provision is stricken out which authorizes the reorganization of the customs service.

Mr. WARREN. There are two paragraphs. The first one refers to the continuing annual appropriation of $5,500,000. The first part of the next paragraph is to authorize the President to make a reorganization, but the latter part of it carries with it a power that the committee on consideration believed ought to be curtailed. Hence they struck out those paragraphs so that in conference there might be an assembling of the wisdom of both sides and the information to see, if any legislation should be deemed necessary, whether it could be less drastic.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the committee is not opposed to the principle but think it is too drastic, and their purpose is in conference to agree upon some modified form?

Mr. WARREN. The committee is in harmony with the idea to economize if possible, but it did not consider, with the information which came later, that the language of the House should go unchanged.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri that a thing of this kind comes like lightning from a clear sky to those who are brought under it, it not having been contemplated, and is not known until it comes out in the bill when printed in the House. Then follows testimony from the other side, which was not then before the House; hence they come to the Senate, and therefore it is often necessary, even when we are in harmony on the main issue, to strike out the language in order to get it in conference. If we pass any language here just as it has been passed upon the other side, then we are bound by it, of course.

Mr. REED. With the understanding that that is the position of the committee, I have no objection. I think something of that kind ought to be done.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service," on page 47, line 12, after the words "medical officers," to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$225,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of acting assistant surgeons (noncommissioned medical officers), $225,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 15, after the word "expenses," to insert "including the expenses of medical officers when officially detailed to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of public health," so as to make the clause read:

For freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, including the expenses of medical officers when officially detailed to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of public health, $30,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this seems like a small matter, but I do not think we ought to pay the traveling expenses of these medical officers to go up and down the country attending meetings of all the associations in the States. When a medical officer is sent on official duty to any point it is all right, but we should not provide here so as to allow the medical officers to attend every little State association, to go to some watering place. They hold their associations all over the country at such places. One will be held in Asheville, N. C.; another in San Francisco; and they are held all over the country. I do not think that the public health of the country will be helped by this payment by the taxpayers of the expenses of some medical officer to take a trip to Asheville or some other watering place. I do not think it ought to be allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator no doubt remembers that all such appropriations for the Forestry Service and the Geological Survey have already been stricken from the bill. But this item carries $30,000 for the promotion of the public health among other things. The act of July 1, 1902, requires the holding of annual conferences of the health authorities of the States and Territories and the District of Columbia with the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and in addition authority for calling of conferences of State and Territorial boards of health, and upon application of not less than five State and Territorial boards of health, quarantine authority must call a conference.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not confined to that. The language is:

For freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, including the expenses of medical officers when officially detailed to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of public health.

Any sort of an association is included.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. Any sort of an association to be held is included under this language.

Mr. SMOOT. No; only conferences for the promotion of the public health.

Mr. OVERMAN. All these associations are for the promotion of public health. There is a tuberculosis association, an osteopath association, and every kind of association for the promotion of public health. Therefore, when you provide that they shall have their expenses paid to attend these associations, they will attend them and have a good time. The other doctors pay their expenses and are glad to go. They go to San Francisco, they go to Denver, they go to Asheville, to this place and that place, just to have a good time, and they all pay their expenses. Why should the Government pay the expenses of medical officers to attend all these associations? If there was to be one association held for the promotion of public health by the Government itself, that would be all right, and full authority is granted for that in the language put in by the House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I sympathize in some degree with what my colleague on the committee says, but unfortunately we are in a conflict of legislation. As the Senator says, this provides for transportation and traveling expenses to conferences and conventions. In the District of Columbia appropriation bill, lately passed, there was a provision which prevents the payment of all expenses of this nature. Hence, almost every department and bureau has assailed the committee, asking that that particular department or bureau's privilege be restored. We so far have not consented to it except in two cases, this one of the medical officers who, under the law, have to travel, and we felt that it was a dangerous project to refuse it. The other case is that of the Bureau of Mines, where the information has to be carried to the miner as he is at the mine, the rescue cars, and so forth. I will say to the Senator that this one and the other relating to mines are the only two provided for.

Mr. OVERMAN. All the medical officers under the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service are included, and there may be hundreds of associations to attend.

Mr. WARREN. We do not increase the amount.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, contract the language so that they can go to only one association a year.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there are more conferences than one a year held under the law. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, also, that the amount has been greatly reduced. The Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service say it will be impossible to get along with less than this amount. The quarantine authorities attend these conferences, which are compelled to be held under the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. The associations are compelled to be held?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. How compelled to be held?

Mr. SMOOT. They are compelled under the act of July 1, 1902, which provides an annual conference, and oftener if requested by five States or Territories. I will say that they are very important gatherings, as is demonstrated by the reports published of the meetings.

Mr. OVERMAN. The men generally who gather there have not their expenses paid.

Mr. SMOOT. No; outside of the Government service they have not, unless the State——

Mr. OVERMAN. If these officials want to go let them go and pay their own expenses.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the others, they pay their own expenses, unless the States and boards of health of the different States pay their expenses. As to that I am not advised.

Mr. OVERMAN. We do not pay their expenses in my State. They generally go without having their expenses paid for them, and they are glad to go, and they have a good time. The meeting of the assocition is held in some watering place, and they not only have a good time, but the meeting is beneficial to the public. What I complain of is that they do not pay their expenses and that the Government should pay the expenses of all these officers for the purpose of going to these associations. There is no provision limiting it to one association.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount appropriated is only $30,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. But $30,000 would pay the traveling expenses to a good many associations.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not really positive that members of the medical associations of the different States have not their expenses paid either by the medical association of the State or by the State itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. This would allow them to go to every State association in the United States that meets in a State, not only to a national association. They could go to the national association, but every State has an association, and these officers can have their traveling expenses paid to go all over this country, from California to Maine, and attend every association in the country.

Mr. REED. Take a vacation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; take a vacation; that is what it is; and to have a good time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina, in view of the fact that the National Government has entered upon this question of public health and is expending a large amount of money, aggregating nearly half a million dollars, and has practically entered upon a system of cooperation with the various State and municipalities in the work of advancing the public health, creating a kind of chain between the State, municipal, and National Governments, does he not think it wise to use some method and go to some expense?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is always reaching out for money. Everybody wants to reach out for money.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is simply with a view of bringing them together so that they can exchange ideas and really accomplish something under this scheme for the improvement of the public health. Will we accomplish our purpose unless we bring these people together?

Mr. OVERMAN. We have accomplished it heretofore. These men have been going about and delivering lectures, but now they want their expenses paid. I do not want to criticize the board at all, but it seems to me that the taxpayers of the country ought not to pay the expenses of these doctors in traveling all over this country to the different associations to have a good time. I object to it. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 47.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator whether he desires to strike out the whole provision? The House provided "for freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, $30,000."

Mr. OVERMAN. We know what the House language means, and if we had not known it we would not have agreed to it; but you propose to add "including the expenses of the medical officers when officially detailed to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of public health."

The language of the House means necessary traveling expenses when the superintendent sends a doctor down about yellow fever, or one is sent to this or that place. It is right, when they are sent out for the public benefit, of the health of the country, that their expenses should be paid, but here you add including expenses to attend associations. How many associations? What association? Where and when? I think the House language is sufficient to pay the traveling expenses when they are sent out upon public business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me? The bill in the House was made up before the District appropriation bill was finished. If the Senator will look at the inhibition in the District bill he will see why it was necessary to put in this language.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not understand why the District bill has any connection with this bill.

Mr. WARREN. In the District bill there is legislation which covers all the departments.

Mr. OVERMAN. General legislation on the District of Columbia appropriation bill to cover all departments of the Government! That is very strange.

Mr. WARREN. With all deference to the members of that subcommittee and our own committee, of which the Senator from North Carolina is a conspicuous and industrious member, I do not think they had any business to put that kind of legislation in that kind of a bill, but they did it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am very much surprised to learn that. I should like to know what the provision is.

Mr. REED. That is what I rose to inquire.

Mr. WARREN. The provision prohibits payment of any expenses of officers or employees of departments of the Government attending meetings. It makes a very sweeping inhibition.

Mr. OVERMAN. And this is intended to repeal that?

Mr. WARREN. One moment. When the House made up the bill and put in the language exactly as it appeared—

For freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, $30,000—

I assume they did not intend to cripple the service. Now, as this bill would leave it, it inhibits all the departments in Washington except those that are excepted in this bill, this one and the Bureau of Mines. I believe they are the only two. We have here any amount of testimony from the other departments, for instance, from the Geological Survey. They make a very good case. I thought that since the Senate had given its consent and it had become a law to inhibit these traveling expenses, we would try it for a year, but I hesitated; and I think the members of the committee agreed with me, against a law regulating these medical offices. As there was a conflict of law, we felt that we ought to give them liberty where they were officially detailed as they are here to attend these meetings.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we all recognize that it has been a crime the way the people in all these departments have been traveling at public expense all over the country. Now, since we have the inhibition in the District appropriation bill, let it stay there. Do not repeal it by a provision in another bill after we adopted that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe the Senator would think it fair to have a prohibition put in this bill, as was in the District appropriation bill, preventing the Government of the United States from paying the traveling expenses of its medical officers, compelled as they are to go to all parts of the United States. The law requires that they shall hold these meetings. That is why the exception has been made in this case.

I was in total accord with the Senator in putting in the District appropriation bill a provision prohibiting the expenses being paid of Government employees to attend the meetings of ordinary congresses held in all parts of the country. But we found that where medical officials were detailed to attend a health conference the law prohibits the payment of their traveling expenses, and to obviate that this provision was put in the bill by the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think when the law requires them to go to a certain place the language put in the bill by the House is not sufficient to indicate that all their expenses shall be paid?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the law that we put into the District appropriation bill prevents the payment of their traveling expenses, no matter where they may be sent officially.

Mr. OVERMAN. It provides that where they are sent officially they shall be paid their traveling expenses.

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment is allowed to remain, it will provide for the payment.

Mr. WARREN. If you strike out the provision recommended by the committee, there will be no authority to pay their traveling expenses, although they are required to go.

Mr. OVERMAN. The language of the bill as passed by the House I propose to leave in——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me to read the section in the District appropriation bill, he will then see the point. It is rather peculiar, and I think it will give him more light. Section 8 of that bill reads:

No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for membership fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia in any society or association or for expenses of attendance of any person at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association—

Now, if the Senator will notice—

unless such fees, dues, or expenses are authorized to be paid by specific appropriations for such purposes or are provided for in express terms in some general appropriation.

Therefore we provide in a general appropriation bill specifically for that and for mining and let the other stand, so far as we are presenting the bill from the committee to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must also remember that we are not increasing the appropriation a cent. We can not say just how much of this $30,000 will be used for that purpose, but it will be only a very small portion indeed. However, under the law just read by the Senator from Wyoming, it would be impossible to pay them unless we specifically provided for it in this appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the law is a good law as we made it, because there have been hundreds of thousands of dollars paid out as we know to these people for traveling expenses, even paying association fees. I did not know that was in the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I do not think it has any place there, but it is the law to-day. With the language here in the House bill, "for freight, transportation, and traveling expenses," if you will put in there "for any association provided by law" I am willing to accept it, but with your broad language you can send them to any sort of an association and pay their expenses anywhere to every State, and have them make a junketing trip sometimes.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to amend the committee amendment by adding after the word "attend," in line 17, the word "annual," and after the word "of," in the same line, to add the word "national," so as to read:

Detailed to attend annual meetings of national associations.

Mr. REED. It is impossible to hear on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 47, line 17, it is proposed before the word "meetings" to insert the word "annual," and before the word "associations," in the same line, to insert the word "national," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

For freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, including the expenses of medical officers when officially detailed to attend annual meetings of national associations for the promotion of public health, $30,000.

Mr. WARREN. I wish the Senator would drop the second part, "national," because they might want to attend international associations. I have no objection to the first part of the amendment, the insertion of the word "annual," if the Senator will withdraw the other one.

Mr. GRONNA. I will withdraw the second part of the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Let the amendment be reported as changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. Simply before the word "meetings," in line 17, insert the word "annual."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment to the amendment. It is to add:

Provided, That not more than $3,000 shall be paid for traveling expenses.

Mr. REED. It is not limited to traveling expenses.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would not have it apply to traveling expenses, because they have to travel under duty. The Senator means to apply it to attending conferences, does he not?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Let the Secretary report the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the paragraph add the following proviso:

Provided, That not more than $3,000 shall be paid for the traveling expenses of such medical officers when detailed to attend such annual meeting.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I hope that amendment to the amendment will not be agreed to. The attendance upon such meetings is an absolute necessity to enable medical officers to keep up with the profession. The medical men in private life never fail to keep up with the progress of their science by attending such meetings, and the science of the medical officers employed by the United States has been worth hundreds of millions of dollars within the last few years.

The Senator from North Carolina will remember of what value to his State it has been to be relieved from the necessity of constant quarantine against yellow fever because the medical officers of the United States were abreast of their profession. The meetings of the men who have been studying, reading, experimenting, and engaged in hospital practice in order that they may communicate their knowledge to each other and stimulate each other by association and discussion constitute one of the most effective and valuable elements in the advance of the profession. We should not be niggardly in our treatment of a subject of great public importance like this, a subject in which medical officers of the United States have reflected honor and credit upon our country and have conferred untold blessings upon mankind.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I indorse every word the Senator from New York has said.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I am accused sometimes of being opposed to the increase of the efficiency of the medical service of the Government. That is quite a mistake. So long as we are dependent upon that means of preserving the public health we should make it just as efficient as possible. No Member of the Senate is more ready than am I to support legislation that will bring about that result. The opposition that I have made heretofore has not rested upon any such theory as that. Therefore, if the limitation of the amount of $3,000 is going to cripple the efficiency of the service, I should certainly be disposed to oppose that limitation. I think a great work is to be done through what is called the medical department of the Government in the way of sanitation, and certainly along those lines there should be the greatest possible efficiency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will repeat that I indorse what the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has said; but since the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, I do not see how it can take any more than $3,000 to enable these physicians to attend meetings of national associations. Therefore I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 3, after the words "Hygienic Laboratory," to strike out the sum "$14,900" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

For maintaining the Hygienic Laboratory, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 20, after the words "In all," to strike out the sum "$1,656,745" and insert "$1,686,845," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $1,686,845, which shall include the amount necessary for the medical inspection of aliens, as required by section 17 of the act of Congress approved February 20, 1907.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 49, to insert:

Marine Hospital Sanatorium, Fort Stanton, N. Mex.: For milk house and cold storage, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 2, to insert:

Honolulu Quarantine Station, Hawaii: For sewerage system and latrines, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 7, before the word "Portland," to insert "Eastport and," so as to read:

Quarantine Service: For the maintenance and ordinary expenses, exclusive of pay of officers and employees, of quarantine stations at Eastport and Portland, Me.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 11, after the words "in force," to strike out the sum "$100,000" and insert "$500,000: Provided, That a detailed report of the expenditures hereunder shall annually hereafter be submitted to Congress," so as to make the clause read:

Prevention of epidemics: To enable the President of the United States, in case only of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague, or black death, to aid State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, and in such emergency in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, $500,000: Provided, That a detailed report of the expenditures hereunder shall annually hereafter be submitted to Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee why that radical increase, five times as much as was provided for in the bill as it came from the House, is proposed?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wonder that the Senator from Missouri asks that question. I should do so if I were in his place. I will state to the Senator that the large increase proposed is because of later estimates with reference to the bubonic plague. It is claimed that the bubonic plague is already prevalent to some extent in Porto Rico, and that cases have also been found in Cuba. The desire is to guard every point where ships arrive so as to prevent rats coming ashore, and in that way to quarantine our country against this disease. It is an emergency, and the money will not be spent unless it is necessary to expend it.

Mr. REED. That is satisfactory to me.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under Smithsonian Institution," on page 52, line 5, after the word "expenses," to strike out the sum "$250,000" and insert "$350,000"; and, in line 7, after the word "publications," to insert "and $1,500 for the purchase of a fireproof and burglar-proof safe, with triple time lock, for the office of the disbursing agent for the Government branches under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including the necessary expenses of installation," so as to make the clause read:

For continuing the preservation, exhibition, and increase of the collections from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and from other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees, and all other necessary expenses, $350,000, of which sum $5,500 may be used for necessary drawings and illustrations for publications and $1,500 for the purchase of a fireproof and burglar-proof safe, with triple time lock, for the office of the disbursing agent for the Government branches under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including the necessary expenses of installation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 8, to strike out:

Hereafter all plans and specifications for construction of buildings and bridges in the National Zoological Park shall be prepared by the municipal architect of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer there, and I now give notice that I shall offer it later. I also desire to give notice that I shall move that the bill be again taken up immediately after the Senate adjourns as a court of impeachment.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER). The hour of 12.30 o'clock, to which the Senate, sitting as a court in the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, adjourned, has arrived. The Sergeant at Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now call the names of those Senators who have not been sworn, and such of those Senators as are now present in the Chamber will advance to the desk and take the oath.

The Secretary called the names of Senators who had not been heretofore sworn, and there were no responses.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer the order which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming offers an order, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is sitting in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I offer the order which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming offers an order, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Presiding Officer on the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized to sign all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate, when sitting on impeachment trials, and by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order is agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule IX, and suggest that the oath to the returning officer provided for by that rule be administered.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Texas is, of course, in due order, but I should think it would be suitable to await the arrival of the managers on the part of the House before taking any further proceeding in the cause.

Mr. CULBERSON. The rule provides that this oath shall be administered at 12.30 o'clock. It makes no reference to the presence of the managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will venture to make the suggestion that the return has not yet been made, and the oath is to be administered after the return has been made, as the Chair understands.

At 12 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m. the Assistant Doorkeeper announced the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The managers on the part of the House of Representatives will be conducted to the seats assigned them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The managers were conducted to seats provided in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the left of the Chair, namely, Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON, of Alabama; Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB, of North Carolina; Hon. JOHN C. FLOYD, of Arkansas; Hon. JOHN W. DAVIS, of West Virginia; Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois; Hon. PAUL HOWLAND, of Ohio; and Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the counsel for the respondent.

At 12 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m. the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, and his counsel, A. S. Worthington, Esq., and Robert W. Archbald, jr., Esq., entered the Senate Chamber and were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk, on the right of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate while sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment, of Tuesday, July 16, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the return of the Sergeant at Arms to the summons directed to be served.

The Secretary (Mr. Charles G. Bennett) read the following return appended to the writ of summons:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS.

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Robert W. Archbald, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Robert W. Archbald, by delivery to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at 236 Monroe Avenue, Scranton, Pa., the residence of Robert W. Archbald, on Wednesday, the 17th day of July, 1912, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon of that day.

DANIEL M. RANSDELL,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now administer to the Sergeant at Arms an oath in support of the truth of his return.

The Secretary (Mr. Charles G. Bennett) administered the following oath to the Sergeant at Arms:

I, Daniel M. Ransdell, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the 16th day of July, 1912, by the Senate of the United States, against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge in the Commerce Court, is truly made, and that I have performed such service therein described. So help me, God.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. I do so swear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Robert W. Archbald, Robert W. Archbald, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court: Appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Counsel for the respondent are informed that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the Commerce Court, upon articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, and will hear his answer thereto.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, the respondent is here in person and by counsel, and enters a formal appearance, which I will hand to the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

UNITED STATES v. ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The respondent, Robert W. Archbald, having been served with a summons requiring him to appear before the Senate of the United States at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on Friday, July 19, 1912, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon, to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, now appears in his proper person and also by his counsel, Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Augustus S. Worthington, who are instructed by this respondent to apply to this court for a reasonable time for the preparation of his answer to said articles of impeachment.

R. W. ARCHBALD.

JULY 19, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be placed on file.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Now, Mr. President, I submit a motion on behalf of the respondent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the motion.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

UNITED STATES v. ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The respondent, by his counsel, now comes and moves the court to grant him the period of — days in which to prepare and present his answer to the articles of impeachment presented against him herein.

R. W. ARCHBALD, Jr.
A. S. WORTHINGTON.

JULY 19, 1912.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I submit the following order, and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian, on the 24th day of July, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators, are you ready for the question?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I should like to state that that time seems very short to the counsel for the respondent in view of the number of articles of impeachment which are here and the customs which have been followed heretofore in cases of this kind, and also because of certain circumstances which exist in this case, which I wish to bring to the attention of the court.

In the preliminary hearing which was had on this matter, which occupied a good deal of time and the report of which covers several hundred pages, the respondent was aided not only by the counsel here present, but by two other members of the bar who reside and practice law at Scranton, in which city most of the circumstances arose which are to be investigated in this trial. One of those gentlemen, Mr. Martin, is now lying on his back in a hospital after a surgical operation, from which he is recovering. The other, on account of serious illness, is unable to be here, and is in such a situation that we can not now confer with him.

It was for that reason that in the motion which we made we left blank the number of days which we were to have, to be filled at the pleasure of the court.

I had hoped we might get 20 days for that purpose. As I calculate the time proposed to be given by the order which has just been presented by a member of the court, it would give us but five days, which, I think, would be entirely insufficient, in view of the fact that one of those days is dies non.

On behalf of the respondent and his counsel, I therefore respectfully ask that we be given at least 20 days for the purpose indicated.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, with the permission of the court I desire to express in a brief way the views of the managers.

After a conference had this morning, the managers reached the conclusion that perhaps four or five days would be ample time to afford the accused the opportunity of fully answering all the articles of impeachment in this case.

With the indulgence of the court, I desire to say that this matter of the impeachment of Judge Archbald has had a thorough sifting on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, at which hearing Judge Archbald was present every day in his own proper person and by his counsel. Among the counsel so present every day were the distinguished gentleman who has just addressed the Chair, Mr. Worthington, and Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr. The other two gentlemen were there a part of the time, and perhaps all of the time. It appeared on that hearing that Mr. Worthington was the chief counsel. In fact, on that hearing Mr. Worthington conducted nearly all of the cross-examination and made most of the suggestions to the committee.

On the 8th day of the present month the articles of impeachment in this case were presented to the House of Representatives and printed in the RECORD of that date. On the 11th day of the present month the same articles were debated in the House of Representatives, and were there adopted with practical unanimity.

The managers think there is nothing by way of surprise contained in the articles of impeachment. We believe Judge Archbald and his counsel are well informed as to every charge set forth in the articles of impeachment. We think five days—or four days, if one day be excluded on account of its being dies non juridicus—are quite sufficient for Judge Archbald to answer these articles of impeachment. Their nature is fully understood. The testimony which induced the House to adopt these articles is perfectly familiar to the counsel, and perfectly familiar to the accused.

Therefore, on behalf of the managers, I desire to say that we think the time fixed by the resolution which has been proposed by the Senator from Wyoming is sufficient to afford the respondent ample opportunity to make appropriate answer and to do full justice to him in the premises.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. May I add a word, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It may not be known to the members of the court that during all my professional life I have resided in this city and have practiced law here. The two gentlemen——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am requested by some Senators who sit in the rear of the Chamber to ask that the counsel be requested to speak in a louder tone.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I had stated that during my whole professional life I have resided and practiced law in the city of Washington. Mr. Archbald, jr., who is here with me, has practiced law in Philadelphia. The other two gentlemen were associated with us because they lived in Scranton, practiced law in Scranton, and knew the people and the concerns that are involved in this investigation.

While it is true, as Mr. Manager CLAYTON has stated, that I was ordinarily the spokesman of the counsel who represented Judge Archbald before the Judiciary Committee, it was only because these gentlemen were at my elbow, and could furnish me with information at any moment when it was needed of things that I knew nothing about.

Let me say, in addition to that, that the learned manager is mistaken in supposing that there is nothing in these articles of impeachment which surprises counsel for the respondent. As a matter of fact, there are things here, as to which I have had no opportunity to confer with anybody until this morning, which did surprise me, and as to which I never heard until within a few days.

I have gone over the records of previous impeachment trials, of which there are eight or nine, and I believe there is none in which the time for answering was so short as that within which we are here required to answer these 13 articles of impeachment, every one of them differing as to the nature of the charge and as to the facts which are involved.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, in behalf of the committee which directed me to present the order, I desire to say that they were aware of the fact that the time was perhaps a little shorter than is usual; but they were somewhat controlled in their action by the fact that the three succeeding days each and all are set aside by the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday for other business. Therefore in presenting the order the time was cut from six days to four.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the order?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me the time is rather short, and I would ask the Senator who introduced the order if he would object to having the 31st day of July designated as the return day?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator who introduced the order has no personal views whatever upon it. He will be perfectly satisfied with whatever action the Senate, sitting as a court, may see fit to take.

Mr. McCUMBER. To bring the matter to a point where the Senate may act upon a later date, I move to amend the order so that it will read "the 31st day of July."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, may I be permitted to make a remark in this connection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Manager will permit the amendment to be stated.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Certainly.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "twenty-fourth," and in lieu to insert the word "thirty-first," so that if amended it will read:

Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian, on the 31st day of July, 1912.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I desire to say that in the last proceeding of this nature before the Senate, in the case of Judge Swayne, seven days were accorded to the accused in which to make his answer. The articles of impeachment in that case, according to my recollection, involved as many if not more things or acts than are involved in this case, or at any rate were fully as many, and seven days was deemed in that case quite sufficient.

I do insist most respectfully on the part of the managers that to postpone it to the time designated in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota would not be doing justice to the views of the House or justice to the views of the managers.

Therefore, the managers respectfully ask that the original proposition offered by the Senator from Wyoming be the action of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the time suggested in the resolution offered by the Senator from Wyoming seems to me rather short. We have, as the Senator from Wyoming has stated, three unanimous-consent agreements which carry us from the 24th to the end of that week. I would suggest, therefore, as a modification of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, that the date be fixed on Monday, the 29th, which is the earliest day possible after the unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will accept that suggestion and embody it in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as now proposed will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "the twenty-fourth" and insert in lieu "Monday, the twenty-ninth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to know the attitude of the managers in reference to the proposed date.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the managers direct me to say that they are of opinion that 10 days are more than are requisite to do full justice to the accused in this case, and they are of opinion that the time fixed in the original proposition, as offered by the Senator from Wyoming, will afford the accused ample opportunity in which to make his answer; for it must be known, Mr. President, that then perhaps some other proposition may be made by the accused. This matter of the pleadings ought to be settled at an early day. The judge himself is learned in the law. His counsel is learned in the law. They are fully apprised of the nature of these accusations. This is simply now a requirement as to when he shall make his formal answer, no more and no less. I think that the five days afford ample opportunity for the formal answer to be presented to the Senate, and the managers are of that opinion.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I dislike to continue debate. If the answer to be made in this case were merely a formal answer we could do it now, if all we had to do was to say not guilty. But according to the precedent that is not the form of practice that has been adopted in these impeachment trials. The answers have had more the appearance of an answer in a bill of equity than of a defense in criminal cases. We expect to follow that precedent, and when we answer to answer fully. In order to do that it is important that we should have time to do it properly.

In the one precedent which was referred to by the distinguished manager who has just taken his seat, the last case that was tried here, the time was fixed seven days there because the counsel for the respondent asked that they be given only seven days. Congress was then approaching the 4th of March. It was in February, as I remember, and it was all important to all parties, if the matter was to be finished, that it must proceed at an early date in order to get through by the 4th of March.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota. The Chair is of the opinion that under the rule the yeas and nays have to be taken.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, before the roll is called I want to submit this suggestion: If the answer should be made within the time provided in the order, nothing further will be done, for the reason that the three days immediately following have already been appropriated by the Senate to the consideration of certain tariff bills. If those three days are to be thus occupied, then no good purpose would be served by requiring the answer to be made immediately before those orders that would not be equally served by an answer on Monday immediately succeeding them.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. BAILEY. I think I am going to anticipate the manager. I was going to say that, of course, if the answer is made as here required, then the managers on the part of the House would have those three days in which to prepare their replication; and I take it for granted that that is one of the reasons why the managers are anxious that the time shall be fixed as at first suggested.

Personally I am not willing to compel the counsel of the defendant to answer before he says he can be ready. When this answer is made, whether there shall be a replication of the House or not will, of course, depend upon the nature of the answer; but when this answer is made the issues will be practically joined, and I think those issues ought to be presented as fairly and as fully as possible.

I do not believe that the saving of three days can warrant us in forcing an answer before the attorney says he can make it in the proper way.

I am all the more willing, Mr. President, to give these three days, because I am one of the Senators who believe this matter ought to be tried before the Senate adjourns, and it will be tried if I can have my way before an adjournment. The convenience or the comfort of Senators can not be considered in a matter of this kind. I would rather stay here the additional 3 days or 10 days to have it tried in a way that shall leave no reason on the part of either the counsel for the respondent or the managers of the House to complain that the Senate has hurried them in an unfair way.

I dislike to see even a vote taken on a question of this kind. It looks to me like the Senate, composed largely of lawyers, would know what is a reasonable time to answer to the 13 counts in this indictment. But the Senators themselves are not more capable of judging that than the honorable managers of the House, all of whom are lawyers, with such reputation and distinction as to have won for themselves a place upon the great law committee of the House. But I would rather err in giving three days too much than to err in giving three days too little.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I feel extremely reluctant to urge anything which would look as if it were inconsiderate. I would be very glad if there could be an agreement between the managers and the learned counsel for the accused in order to avoid the very matter that the Senator from Texas suggests. It is an unpleasant thing at the outset to have a yea-and-nay vote taken, in which there may be some unfortunate variances. Therefore I suggest that the managers and the counsel endeavor to agree upon a day in order to relieve the Senate of the embarrassment of having to decide a question of this kind.

I will only say before taking my seat that, if possible, if the earlier date were fixed, and if upon that date the counsel had not been able to properly prepare and finish the answer, additional time could be, and doubtless would be, granted.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I have just conferred with my brother managers and have reached a conclusion that the managers on the part of the House, for the reasons which have been suggested in this discussion, ought to accede to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, and that is that Monday, the 29th day of the present month, be fixed as the time and the day for the answer to be made by the respondent in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order as it would read if amended will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent present the answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on Monday, the 29th day of July, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer the following order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the managers on the part of the House be allowed until the 1st day of August, 1912, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, to present a replication, or other pleading, of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent. That any subsequent pleadings, either on the part of the managers or of the respondent, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, of which notice shall be given to the House of Representatives and the respondent, respectively, so that all pleadings shall be closed on or before the 4th day of August, 1912.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the managers see no objection to anything contained in that proposed order. They understand, however, that should any occasion arise which may make it necessary for them to ask for a change or modification of anything therein contained, the Senate then will give their request for the change or modification its attention and will do whatever is right in the premises.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I desire to modify the order so that it will read on the 3d of August instead of the 4th, the 4th of August coming on Sunday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that modification will be made.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I do not exactly understand the effect of that change.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The effect of the change makes it the 3d instead of the 4th, the 4th being on Sunday.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was hastily dated since the last order was made.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. There can be no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have been instructed by the special committee to present to the Senate the following order, and I ask that it be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia submits an order, which will be read.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That in all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers or counsel for the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer, and not otherwise.

It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other, but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order is agreed to unanimously.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion, if permitted to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. It is true that this is a court of impeachment, but it remains the Senate, and all the precedents show that in the proceedings of an impeachment trial the Senate is always spoken of as the Senate, not as the court.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, if the Senate does not desire the further attendance of the managers at this time, we respectfully beg leave to withdraw.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I offer the following order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That the proceedings of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be printed daily for the use of the Senate as a separate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order will be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move, Mr. President, that the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourn until Monday, the 29th day of July, at half past 12 o'clock postmeridian.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned until Monday, July 29, 1912, at 12.30 o'clock p. m.

The managers on the part of the House and the respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to continue the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It is whether the unfinished business, having been superseded by the impeachment proceeding, the unfinished business should not be laid before the Senate now and then temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Chair observed the fact that the hour of 1 o'clock had arrived, but did not feel at liberty to interrupt the impeachment proceedings. He will now lay the unfinished business before the Senate. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before asking unanimous consent to lay the unfinished business aside temporarily, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. We are utterly unable to hear what is said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Senate will be in order. Senators will take their seats and refrain from audible conversation. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a document entitled "History of Amendments Proposed to the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty," prepared in the office of the Secretary of State and sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it will be of much value in connection with the discussion of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 746, Sixty-first Congress, third session.]

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE AMENDMENTS PROPOSED AND CONSIDERED SINCE THE ACTION OF THE SENATE ON THE FORMER CANAL TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN, AND WHICH HAVE RESULTED IN THE TREATY NOW SUBMITTED.

[Prepared in the Department of State and sent by Mr. Hay to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.]

The Senate's amendments to the former treaty required (first) that there should be in plain and explicit terms an express abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; (second) that the rules of neutrality adopted should not deprive the United States of the right to defend itself and to maintain public order; and (third) that other powers should not in any manner be made parties to the treaty by being invited to ahere to it.

For a better understanding of the scheme of the new treaty, it may be well briefly to advert to the objections suggested by Great Britain to these several amendments.

AS TO THE ABROGATION OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Lord Lansdowne's objections were as to the manner of doing this and as to the substance. It was insisted that in the negotiations which led to the making of the former treaty no attempt had been made to ascertain the views of the British Government on such complete abrogation, and that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty being, as it claimed, an international compact of unquestionable validity, could not be abrogated without the consent of both parties to the contract.

There was in this connection an apparent misconception on the part of His Majesty's Government in respect to the proper function of the Senate in advising the ratification of a treaty with amendments proposed by it. It seemed to be regarded as an attempt on the part of the Senate to accomplish by its own vote, as a final act, the abrogation of an existing treaty, without an opportunity for full consideration of the matter by the other party. It was overlooked that the Senate was simply exercising its undoubted constitutional function of proposing amendments to be communicated to the other party to the contract, to ascertain its views upon the question, and it was hoped by the President—and the hope was expressed in submitting the treaty as amended by the Senate to the British Government—that the amendments would be found acceptable by it. Failing this, there was a full opportunity for His Majesty's Government, by counter propositions, to express its views on this and the other amendments, and so by a continuous negotiation to arrive, if possible, at a mutually satisfactory solution of all questions involved. Nevertheless, in view of the great importance of the Senate's amendments, taken together, it was deemed more expedient by Lord Lansdowne to reject them, but to leave the door open for fresh negotiations, which might have a more happy issue; and he earnestly deprecated a final failure of the parties to agree, and emphatically expressed the desire of his Government to meet the views of the United States on this most important matter.

The principal substantial objection to the Senate's amendment, completely superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, was that if this were done the provisions of article 1 of that treaty, which had been left untouched by the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty, would be annulled, and thereby both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, acquire entire freedom of action in Central America, a change which Lord Lansdowne thought would certainly be of advantage to the United States, and might be of substantial importance.

AS TO THE RIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES, NOTWITHSTANDING THE NEUTRAL RULES ADOPTED BY THE TREATY, TO DEFEND ITSELF BY ITS OWN FORCES, AND TO SECURE THE MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ORDER, COVERED BY WHAT WAS GENERALLY KNOWN AS THE DAVIS AMENDMENT.

His Majesty's Government criticized the vagueness of the language employed in the amendment and the absence of all security as to the manner in which its ends might at some future time be interpreted, but thought that, however precisely it might be worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures and another clause (which has now been omitted) prohibiting fortification of the canal were allowed to stand side by side in the same convention.

This amendment was strenuously objected to by Great Britain as involving a distinct departure from the principle of neutrality which had theretofore found acceptance by both Governments, inasmuch as it would, as construed by Lord Lansdowne, permit the United States in time of peace as well as in time of war to resort to whatever warlike acts it pleased in and near the canal, which would be clearly inconsistent with its intended neutral character and would deprive the commerce and navies of the world of the free use of it.

It was insisted that by means of the amendment the obligation of Great Britain to respect the neutrality of the canal under all circumstances would remain in force, while that of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified, and that this would result in a one-sided agreement by which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike act in or near the canal, while the United States could resort to any such acts, even in time of peace, which it might deem necessary to secure its own safety.

Moreover, it was insisted that by this amendment, in connection with the third amendment, which excluded other powers from becoming parties to the contract, Great Britain would be placed at a great disadvantage as compared with all other powers, inasmuch as she alone, with all her vast interests in the commerce of the world, would be bound under all circumstances to respect the neutrality of the canal, while the United States, even in time of peace, would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal on the plea of necessity for its own safety, and all other powers not being bound by the treaty could at their pleasure disregard its provisions.

AS TO THE AMENDMENT STRIKING OUT THE ARTICLE IN THE TREATY AS SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE, WHICH PROVIDED FOR AN INVITATION TO THE OTHER POWERS TO COME IN AND ADHERE TO IT.

This was emphatically objected to because if acquiesced in by Great Britain she would be bound by what Lord Lansdowne described as the "stringent rules of neutral conduct" prescribed by the treaty, which would not be equally binding upon the other powers, and it was urged that the adhesion of other powers to the treaty as parties would furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal.

In the hope of reconciling the conflicting views thus presented between the former treaty as amended by the Senate and the objections thereto of the British Government, the treaty now submitted for the consideration of the Senate was drafted.

The substantial differences from the former treaty are as follows:

First. In the new draft of treaty the provisions superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a whole, instead of being parenthetically inserted, as by the former Senate amendment, was made the subject of an independent article and presented as the first article of the treaty. It was thus submitted to the consideration of the British Government in connection with the other substantial provisions of the treaty which declared the neutrality of the canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality.

Second. By a change in the first line of article 3, instead of the United States and Great Britain jointly adopting as the basis of the neutralization of the canal the rules of neutrality prescribed for its use as was provided by the former treaty, the United States now alone adopts them.

This was regarded as a very radical and important change and one which would go far toward a reconciliation of the conflicting views of the two Governments.

It relieves Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the neutrality of the canal, which by the former treaty had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States, and thus meets the main stress of the objection which seemed to underlie or be interwoven with her other objections to the former Senate amendments. The United States alone as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

It was also believed that this change would be in harmony with the national wish that this great interoceanic waterway should not only be constructed and owned, but exclusively controlled and managed, by the United States.

Third. The next important change from the former treaty consists in the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of article 3.

No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment—which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed, when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in Rule I that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

Fourth. In conformity with the Senate's emphatic rejection of article 3 of the former treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would, immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty.

It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality (now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend its neutrality) would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made by Lord Landsdowne to the Senate's excision of the article inviting the other powers to come in, viz, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in case of war with the United States.

Fifth. The next change from the former treaty is the omission of the provision in clause 7 of article 3, which prohibited the fortification of the canal, and the transfer to clause 2 of the remaining provision of clause 7, that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances, and considering that now by the new treaty Great Britain is relieved of all the responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security, it was thought entirely fair to omit the prohibition that "no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent."

Sixth. It will be observed that, although the words "in time of war as in time of peace" had been omitted from clause 1 of article 3 upon the theory that the omission of these words would dispense with the necessity of the Davis amendment, and that war between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties and remit both parties to their natural right of self-defense, the same words are retained in the sixth clause of article 3, which provides that the plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed part of it for the purposes of this treaty, and "in time of war as in time of peace" shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness.

It was considered that such specific provision was in the general interest of commerce and of civilization, and that all nations would regard such a work as sacred under all circumstances.

It was hoped that the changes above enumerated from the former treaty would practically reconcile the conflicting contentions of the two Governments and would lead to the much-desired result of an entire concurrence of views between them.

With the exception of these changes care was taken in the draft of the new treaty to preserve the exact language, which had passed both the Senate and the British Government without objection, and, as is believed, without criticism.

The hope that the changes thus made had effectually met the British objections to the former treaty as amended by the Senate was almost realized.

The proposed draft of the new treaty was transmitted to Lord Lansdowne, and after mature deliberation he proposed on the part of His Majesty's Government only three substantial amendments.

He recognized the weighty importance of the change by which Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility for enforcing the neutrality and maintaining the security of the canal, and that all this burden was solely assumed by the United States. He also appreciated the importance of the other proposed changes in the direction of harmony.

Under this modified aspect of the relations of the two nations to the canal, he was not indisposed to consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if the "general principle" of neutrality, which was reaffirmed in the preamble of the new treaty as well as of the former one, should be preserved and secured against any change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization should govern, as far as possible, all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He referred in this connection to articles 1 and 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

He therefore proposed, by way of amendment, the insertion of an additional article, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would be inclined to withdraw its objection to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The amendment thus proposed by him was in the following language, viz:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under this treaty."

This proposed article was regarded by the President as too far-reaching for the purpose in view, and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which contemplated only future treaty stipulations when any new route should prove to be practicable, into a very definite and certain present treaty, fastening the crystallized rules of neutrality adopted now for this canal upon every other interoceanic communication across the Isthmus, and as perpetuating in a more definite and extended form, by a sort of reenactment of the eighth article, the embarrassing effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which the United States hoped to be relieved altogether.

He believed that now that a canal is about to be built at the sole cost of the United States for the equal benefit of all nations, it was sufficient for the present treaty to provide for that one canal, and that it was hardly within the range of possibility that the United States would ever build more than one canal between the two oceans.

The President was, however, not only willing, but desirous, that the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty should be applicable to this canal now intended to be built, notwithstanding any change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory through which it should pass. This "general principle" of neutralization had always in fact been insisted upon by the United States, and he recognized the entire justice of the request of Great Britain that if she should now surrender the material interest which had been secured to her by the first article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which might result in the indefinite future should the territory traversed by the canal undergo a change of sovereignty, this "general principle" should not be thereby affected or impaired.

These views were communicated to His Majesty's Government, and as a substitute for the article proposed by Lord Lansdowne the following was proposed on the part of the United States:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Upon a full exchange of views, this article proposed by the United States was accepted by Great Britain and becomes article 4 of the treaty now submitted. It is thought to do entire justice to the reasonable demands of Great Britain in preserving the general principle of neutralization and at the same time to relieve the United States of the vague, indefinite, and embarrassing obligations imposed by the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

During the discussions upon this article it was suggested that although no particular route was mentioned in the proposed treaty as the route to be traversed by the canal, yet as the canal had been so commonly mentioned as the "Nicaragua Canal," and the intended treaty as the "Nicaragua Canal treaty," it might possibly be claimed that the treaty did not apply to a canal by the Panama route, or by any other possible route. But it had always been intended by the President that the treaty should apply to the canal which should be first constructed, by whichever or whatever route, and to remove the apprehention referred to and to exclude all possible doubt in the matter, it was agreed that the preamble should be amended by inserting in the preamble after the word "oceans" the words "by whatever route may be considered expedient."

His Majesty's Government at first strenuously objected to the absence from the treaty of any provision for other powers coming in, so as to be bound by its terms. It protested against being bound by what it regarded as stringent rules of neutrality which should not be equally binding upon other powers.

Lord Lansdowne accordingly proposed the following amendment, viz:

"To insert in rule 1 of article 3, after the word 'nation,' the words 'which shall agree to observe these rules,' and in the following line, after the word 'nation,' the words 'so agreeing,' so as to make the clause read:

"'1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing,'" etc.

The President, however, could not consent to this amendment, because he apprehended that it might be construed as making the other powers parties to the contract and as giving them contract rights in the canal, and that it would thus practically restore to the treaty the substance of the provision which the Senate had struck out as article 3 of the former treaty. He believed also that there was a strong national feeling against giving to the other powers anything in the nature of a contract right in an affair so peculiarly American as the canal; that no other powers had now any right in the premises or anything to give up or part with as consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they are to rely on the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in this treaty; and that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization there set forth. These rules are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the only way in which other nations are bound by them is that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

It was also apparent that the proposed amendment if accepted would make rule 1 more objectionable than the third article of the former treaty, which was stricken out by the Senate's amendment, for that only invited other powers to come in and become parties to the contract after ratification, whereas the proposed provision would rather compel other powers to come in and become parties to the contract in the first instance as a condition precedent to the use of the canal by them.

Upon due consideration of these suggestions, and at the same time to put all the powers upon the same footing, viz, that they could use the canal only by complying with the rules of neutrality adopted and prescribed, an amendment to Lord Lansdowne's amendment was proposed and agreed upon, viz:

"To strike out from his amendment the words 'which shall agree to observe' and substitute therefor the word 'observing,' and in the next line to strike out the words 'so agreeing' and to insert, before the word 'nation,' the word 'such.'"

This made the clause as finally agreed upon and found in the treaty as now submitted for the consideration of the Senate:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation," etc.

Thus the whole idea of contract right in the other powers is eliminated, and the vessels of any nation which shall refuse or fail to observe the rules adopted and prescribed may be deprived of the use of the canal.

One other amendment proposed by Lord Lansdowne was regarded by the President as so entirely reasonable that it was agreed to without discussion. This was the insertion at the end of clause 1 of article 3 the words: "Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," and the word "convention," wherever it occurs, has been changed to "treaty."

It is believed that this memorandum will put the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in full possession of the history of all changes in the treaty since the action of the Senate on the former amendment.

No. 1.

Lord Pauncefote to the Marquis of Lansdowne.

(Received Jan. 7, 1901.)

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship a copy of a note which I have received from the United States Secretary of State, formally announcing to me, for the information of Her Majesty's Government, the ratification of the Nicaragua Canal treaty by the Senate on the 20th instant, with three amendments.

Mr. Hay, after giving the text of those amendments, states that he has instructed the United States ambassador in London to express to your lordship the hope of his Government that the amendments will be found acceptable to that of Her Majesty.

I have, etc.,
PAUNCEFOTE.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 1.]

Mr. Hay to Lord Pauncefote.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 22, 1900.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to inform you that the Senate, by its resolution of the 20th December last, has given its advice and consent to the ratification of the convention, signed at Washington on the 5th of February last by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with the following amendments:

1. After the words "Clayton-Bulwer convention" and before the word "adopt" in the preamble of article 2, the words "which convention is hereby superseded" are inserted.

2. A new paragraph is added to the end of section 5 of article 2 in the following language:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

3. Article 3, reading "The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers, and invite them to adhere to it," is stricken out.

4. Article 4 is made article 3.

I inclose a printed copy of the convention as signed (see United States No. 1, 1900), and a copy of it showing its reading as amended by the Senate.

I have instructed Mr. Choate to express to the Marquis of Lansdowne this Government's hope that the amendments will be found acceptable to that of Her Majesty.

The supplementary convention which I signed with you on the 5th May last, prolonging the time within which the ratifications of the convention of the 5th February last shall be exchanged, for a period of seven months from the 5th August last, has been consented to by the Senate without amendment.

I have, etc.,
JOHN HAY.

Convention of February 5, 1900, as amended by the Senate.

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 5 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., Her Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 2. The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople, the 29th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this convention and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

ART. 3. The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London within six months from the date hereof, or earlier, if possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and thereunto affixed their seals.

JOHN HAY.
PAUNCEFOTE.

No. 2.

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Lord Pauncefote.

FOREIGN OFFICE, February 22, 1901.

MY LORD: The American ambassador has formerly communicated to me the amendments introduced by the Senate of the United States into the convention, signed at Washington in February last, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

These amendments are three in number, namely:

1. The insertion in article 2, after the reference to article 8, of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, of the words "which convention is hereby superseded."

2. The addition of a new paragraph after section 5 of article 2 in the following terms:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

3. The excision of article 3, which provides that—

"The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it."

Mr. Choate was instructed to express the hope that the amendments would be found acceptable by Her Majesty's Government.

It is our duty to consider them as they stand, and to inform your excellency of the manner in which, as the subject is now presented to us, we are disposed to regard them.

It will be useful, in the first place, to recall the circumstances in which negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement supplementary to the convention of 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, were initiated.

So far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, there was no desire to procure a modification of that convention. Some of its provisions had, however, for a long time past been regarded with disfavor by the Government of the United States, and in the President's message to Congress of December, 1898, it was suggested, with reference to a concession granted by the Government of Nicaragua, that some definite action by Congress was urgently required if the labors of the past were to be utilized, and the linking of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a practical waterway to be realized. It was further urged that the construction of such a maritime highway was more than ever indispensable to that intimate and ready intercommunication between the eastern and western seaboards of the United States demanded by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands and the prospective expansion of American influence and commerce in the Pacific, and that the national policy called more imperatively than ever for the "control" of the projected highway by the Government of the United States.

This passage in the message having excited comment, your excellency made inquiries of the Secretary of State in order to elicit some information as to the attitude of the President. In reply, the views of the United States Government were very frankly and openly explained. You were also most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations. But in view of the strong national feeling in favor of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and of the improbability of the work being accomplished by private enterprise, the United States Government were prepared to undertake it themselves upon obtaining the necessary powers from Congress. For that purpose, however, they must endeavor, by friendly negotiation, to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the "general principle" therein declared, enable the great object in view to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world. Although the time had hardly arrived for the institution of formal negotiations to that end, Congress not having yet legislated, the United States Government, nevertheless, were most anxious that your excellency should enter at once into pourparlers with a view to preparing, for consideration, a scheme of arrangement.

Her Majesty's Government agreed to this proposal, and the discussions which took place in consequence resulted in the draft convention which Mr. Hay handed to your excellency on the 11th January, 1899.

At that time the joint high commission over which the late Lord Herschell presided was still sitting. That commission was appointed in July, 1898, to discuss various questions at issue between Great Britain and the United States, namely, the fur-seal fishery, the fisheries off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Alaskan boundary, alien-labor laws, reciprocity, transit of merchandise, mining rights, naval vessels on the Great Lakes, definition and marking of frontiers, and conveyance of persons in custody. But serious difficulties had arisen in the attempt to arrive at an understanding, and it had become doubtful whether any settlement would be effected.

In reply, therefore, to a request for a speedy answer with regard to the convention, the Marquis of Salisbury informed Mr. White, the American chargé d'affaires, that he could not help contrasting the precarious prospects and slowness of the negotiations which were being conducted by Lord Herschell with the rapidity of decision proposed in the matter of the convention. Her Majesty's Government might be reproached with having come to a precipitate agreement on a proposal which was exclusively favorable to the United States, while they had come to no agreement at all on the controversy where there was something to be conceded on both sides.

Shortly afterwards Lord Herschell intimated that the difficulties in regard to the question of the Alaskan boundary seemed insuperable, and that he feared it might be necessary to break off the negotiations of which he had hitherto had the charge. Upon this Lord Salisbury informed Mr. White that he did not see how Her Majesty's Government could sanction any convention for amending the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the opinion of this country would hardly support them in making a concession which would be wholly to the benefit of the United States, at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

The last meeting of the joint high commission took place on the 20th February, 1899. Except for the establishment of a modus vivendi on the Alaskan frontier, no progress has been made since that date toward the adjustment of any of the questions which the high commissioners were appointed to discuss.

It was in these circumstances that the proposal for a canal convention was revived at the beginning of last year.

On the 21st January your lordship reported that a bill, originally introduced in 1899, had been laid before Congress, empowering the President to acquire from the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua the control of such portion of territory as might be desirable or necessary, and to direct the Secretary of War, when such control had been secured, to construct the canal and make such provisions for defense as might be required for the safety and protection of the canal and the terminal harbors.

It was probable that the bill would be passed, and it was clear that additional embarrassment would be caused by an enactment opposed to the terms of the proposed convention, and in direct violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. On the other hand, your lordship's information led to the confident expectation that the convention as signed would, if agreed to by Her Majesty's Government, be ratified by the Senate.

In these circumstances Her Majesty's Government consented to reopen the question, and after due consideration determined to accept the convention unconditionally, as a signal proof of their friendly disposition and of their desire not to impede the execution of a project declared to be of national importance to the people of the United States.

Your Excellency stated that the United States Government expressed satisfaction at this happy result and appreciation of the conciliatory disposition shown by Her Majesty's Government.

The convention was forthwith submitted to the Senate for ratification, and on the 9th March the committee charged with its examination reported in favor of ratification, with the insertion, subsequently adopted, after section 5 of article 2, of a paragraph containing provision that the rules laid down in the preceding sections should not apply to measures for the defense of the United States by its own forces and the maintenance of public order. This alteration was discussed by the Senate in secret session on the 5th April, but no vote was taken upon it nor upon the direct question of ratification.

The bill empowering the President to construct and provide for the defense of the canal passed the House of Representatives by a large majority on the 2d of May. The Senate, however, postponed consideration of the bill, although favorably reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

After the recess, during which the presidential election took place, the discussion was resumed in the Senate. On the 20th of December the vote was taken, and resulted in the ratification of the convention with the three amendments which have been presented for the acceptance of His Majesty's Government.

The first of these amendments, that in article 2, declares the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to be "hereby superseded."

Before attempting to consider the manner in which this amendment will, if adopted, affect the parties to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, I desire to call your excellency's attention to a question of principle which is involved by the action of the Senate at this point.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is an international contract of unquestionable validity, a contract which, according to well-established international usage, ought not to be abrogated or modified, save with the consent of both the parties to the contract. In spite of this usage, His Majesty's Government find themselves confronted by a proposal communicated to them by the United States Government, without any previous attempt to ascertain their views, for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The practical effect of the amendment can best be understood by reference to the inclosed copy of the articles of the treaty, Nos. 1 and 6, which, assuming that the United States Government would undertake all the obligations imposed by article 4 of the treaty, contain the only provisions (printed in italics) not replaced by new provisions, covering the same ground, in the convention.

Under article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the two powers agreed that neither would occupy or fortify or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America, nor attain any of the foregoing objects by protection afforded to or alliance with any State or people of Central America. There is no similar agreement in the convention. If, therefore, the treaty were wholly abrogated, both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, recover entire freedom of action in Central America. The change would certainly be of advantage to the United States, and might be of substantial importance.

Under the other surviving portion of the treaty (part of article 6) provision is made for treaties with the Central American States in furtherance of the object of the two powers and for the exercise of good offices should differences arise as to the territory through which the canal will pass. In this case abrogation would, perhaps, signify but little to this country. There is nothing in the convention to prevent Great Britain from entering into communication, or exercising good offices, with the Central American States, should difficulties hereafter arise between them and the United States.

The other two amendments present more formidable difficulties.

The first of them, which reserves to the United States the right of taking any measures which it may find necessary to secure by its own forces the defense of the United States, appears to His Majesty's Government to involve a distinct departure from the principle which has until now found acceptance with both Governments—the principle, namely, that in time of war as well as in time of peace the passage of the canal is to remain free and unimpeded, and is to be so maintained by the power or powers responsible for its control.

Were this amendment added to the convention the United States would, it is presumed, be within their rights, if at any moment when it seemed to them that their safety required it, in view of warlike preparations not yet commenced, but contemplated or supposed to be contemplated by another power, they resorted to warlike acts in or near the canal—acts clearly inconsistent with the neutral character which it has always been sought to give it, and which would deny the free use of it to the commerce and navies of the world.

It appears from the report of the Senate committee that the proposed addition to article 2 was adopted from article 10 of the Suez Canal convention, which runs as follows:

"Similarly, the provisions of articles 4, 5, 7, and 8[1] shall not interfere with the measures which His Majesty the Sultan and His Highness the Khedive, in the name of His Imperial Majesty, and within the limits of the firmans granted, might find it necessary to take for securing by their own forces the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order.

"In case His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, or His Highness the Khedive, should find it necessary to avail themselves of the exceptions for which this article provides, the signatory powers of the declaration of London shall be notified thereof by the Imperial Ottoman Government.

"It is likewise understood that the provisions of the four articles aforesaid shall in no case occasion any obstacle to the measures which the Imperial Ottoman Government may think it necessary to take in order to insure by its own forces the defense of its other possessions situated on the eastern coast of the Red Sea."

It is, I understand, contended in support of the Senate amendment that the existence of the above provisions in the Suez Canal convention justifies the demand now made for the insertion of analogous provisions in regard to the proposed Nicaragua Canal.

But the analogy which it has been attempted to set up fails in one essential particular. The banks of the Suez Canal are within the dominions of a territorial sovereign, who was a party to the convention, and whose established interests it was necessary to protect, whereas the Nicaragua Canal will be constructed in territory belonging not to the United States, but to Central American States, of whose sovereign rights other powers can not claim to dispose.

Moreover, it seems to have escaped attention that article 10 of the Suez Canal convention receives most important modification from article 11, which lays down that "the measures which shall be taken in the cases provided for by articles 9 and 10 of the present treaty shall not interfere with the free use of the canal." The article proceeds to say that "in the same cases the erection of permanent fortifications contrary to the provisions of article 8 is prohibited."

The last paragraph of article 8, which is specially alluded to, runs as follows:

"They (i.e., the agents of the signatory powers in Egypt) shall especially demand the suppression of any work or the dispersion of any assemblage on either bank of the canal the object or effect of which might be to interfere with the liberty and the entire security of the navigation."

The situation which would be created by the addition of the new clause is deserving of serious attention. If it were to be added, the obligation to respect the neutrality of the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain is concerned, remain in force; the obligation of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified. The result would be a one-sided arrangement under which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike action in or around the canal, while the United States would be able to resort to such action to whatever extent they might deem necessary to secure their own safety.

It may be contended that if the new clause were adopted, section 7 of article 2, which prohibits the erection of fortifications, would sufficiently insure the free use of the canal. This contention is, however, one which His Majesty's Government are quite unable to admit. I will not insist upon the dangerous vagueness of the language employed in the amendment, or upon the absence of all security as to the manner in which the words might, at some future time, be interpreted. For, even if it were more precisely worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures, and another forbidding fortifications, were allowed to stand side by side in the convention. To His Majesty's Government it seems, as I have already said, that the amendment might be construed as leaving it open to the United States at any moment, not only if war existed, but even if it were anticipated, to take any measures, however stringent or far-reaching, which, in their own judgment, might be represented as suitable for the purpose of protecting their national interests. Such an enactment would strike at the very root of that "general principle" of neutralization upon which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was based, and which was reaffirmed in the convention as drafted.

But the import of the amendment stands out in stronger relief when the third proposal is considered. This strikes out article 3 of the convention, under which the high contracting parties engaged, immediately upon the convention being ratified, to bring it to the notice of other powers and to invite their adherence. If that adher-

[1]Article 4 guarantees that the Maritime Canal shall remain open in time of war as a free passage even to the ships of war of belligerents, and regulates the revictualing, transit, and detention of such vessels in the canal.

Article 5 regulates the embarkation and disembarkation of troops, munitions, or materials of war by belligerent powers in time of war.

Article 7 prohibits the powers from keeping any vessel of war in the waters of the canal.

Article 8 imposes on the agents of the signatory powers in Egypt the duty of watching over the execution of the treaty and taking measures to secure the free passage of the canal.

ence were given, the neutrality of the canal would be secured by the whole of the adhering powers. Without that adherence it would depend only upon the guarantee of the two contracting powers. The amendment, however, not only removes all prospect of the wider guarantee, but places this country in a position of marked disadvantage, compared with other powers which would not be subject to the self-denying ordinance which Great Britain is desired to accept. It would follow, were His Majesty's Government to agree to such an arrangement, that while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention, Great Britain alone, in spite of her enormous possessions on the American continent, in spite of the extent of her Australasian colonies and her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action, or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

I request that your excellency will explain to the Secretary of State the reasons, as set forth in this dispatch, why His Majesty's Government feel unable to accept the convention in the shape presented to them by the American ambassador, and why they prefer, as matters stand at present, to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. His Majesty's Government have, throughout these negotiations, given evidence of their earnest desire to meet the views of the United States. They would on this occasion have been ready to consider in a friendly spirit any amendments of the convention, not inconsistent with the principles accepted by both Governments, which the Government of the United States might have desired to propose, and they would sincerely regret a failure to come to an amicable understanding in regard to this important subject.

Your lordship is authorized to read this dispatch to the Secretary of State and to leave a copy in his hands.

Articles 1 and 6 of convention between Her Majesty and the United States of America relative to the establishment of a communication by ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, signed at Washington, April 19, 1850:

ARTICLE 1. The Governments of Great Britain and the United States hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords, or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same. Nor will Great Britain or the United States take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the subjects or citizens of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal, which shall not be offered, on the same terms, to the subjects or citizens of the other.

ART. 6. The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated; and the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of Great Britain and the United States will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

MY LORD: Since the rejection by His Majesty's Government of the amendments introduced by the Senate in the interoceanic canal convention of the 5th of February, 1900, Mr. Hay has been engaged in framing a new draft, which, as I understand, he has drawn up after consultation with prominent Senators, and which he trusts will be acceptable to His Majesty's Government.

Mr. Hay has handed me a copy of the draft, which I have the honor to forward herewith for your lordship's consideration.

I have, etc.,

PAUNCEFOTE.

[Inclosure in No. 1.]

Draft of convention relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal.

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present convention shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of said ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purpose of this convention, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. 4. The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London, at the earliest possible time within ——— months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention, and thereunto affixed their seals.

No. 2.

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 3, 1901.

SIR: The draft convention dealing with the question of the interoceanic canal, forwarded in Lord Pauncefote's dispatch of the 25th April, has been most carefully examined.

I inclose, for your information, the accompanying copy of a memorandum explaining the views of His Majesty's Government, which I have authorized Lord Pauncefote, should he think proper, to communicate to Mr. Hay.

His Majesty's Government have approached the consideration of this important question with a sincere desire to facilitate the progress of the great enterprise in which both Governments take such interest. They feel confident that the United States Government will give them credit for the friendly spirit in which Mr. Hay's proposals have been examined and that they will recognize that if it has been deemed necessary to suggest amendments at one or two points it has been because they are considered requisite for the purpose of bringing about the conclusion of a treaty which shall be accepted as equitable and satisfactory by the public of both countries.

I am, etc.,

LANSDOWNE.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 2.]

[Memorandum.]

In the dispatch which I addressed to Lord Pauncefote on the 22d February last, and which was communicated to Mr. Hay on the 11th March, I explained the reasons for which His Majesty's Government were unable to accept the amendments introduced by the Senate of the United States into the convention, signed at Washington in February, 1900, relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal.

The amendments were three in number, namely:

"1. The insertion in article 2, after the reference to article 8, of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, of the words 'which convention is hereby superseded.'

"2. The addition of a new paragraph after section 5 of article 2 in the following terms:

"'It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.'

"3. The excision of article 3, which provides that 'the high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.'"

2. The objections entertained by His Majesty's Government may be briefly stated as follows:

(1) The Clayton-Bulwer convention being an international compact of unquestionable validity could not be abrogated or modified save with the consent of both parties to the contract. No attempt had, however, been made to ascertain the views of Her Late Majesty's Government. The convention dealt with several matters for which no provision had been made in the convention of February, 1900, and if the former were wholly abrogated both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, recover entire freedom of action in Central America, a change which might be of substantial importance.

(2) The reservation to the United States of the right to take any measure which it might find necessary to secure by its own forces the defense of the United States appeared to His Majesty's Government to involve a distinct departure from the principle of neutralization which until then had found acceptance with both Governments, and which both were, under the convention of 1900, bound to uphold. Moreover, if the amendment were added, the obligation to respect the neutrality of the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain was concerned, remain in force; the obligation of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified. The result would be a one-sided arrangement, under which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike action in or around the canal, while the United States would be able to resort to such action even in time of peace to whatever extent they might deem necessary to secure their own safety.

(3) The omission of the article inviting the adherence of other powers placed this country in a position of marked disadvantage compared with other powers; while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention of 1900, Great Britain alone would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government preferred, as matters stood, to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer convention. They had, however, throughout the negotiations given evidence of their earnest desire to meet the views of the United States, and would sincerely regret a failure to come to an amicable understanding in regard to this important subject.

3. Mr. Hay, rightly apprehending that His Majesty's Government did not intend to preclude all further attempt at negotiation, has endeavored to find means by which to reconcile such divergences of view as exist between the two Governments, and has communicated a further draft of a treaty for the consideration of His Majesty's Government.

Following the order of the Senate amendments, the convention now proposed—

(1) Provides by a separate article that the Clayton-Bulwer convention shall be superseded.

(2) The paragraph inserted by the Senate after section 5 of article 2 is omitted.

(3) The article inviting other powers to adhere is omitted.

There are three other points to which attention must be directed:

(a) The words "in time of war as in time of peace" are omitted in rule 1.

(b) The draft contains no stipulation against the acquisition of sovereignty over the Isthmus or over the strip of territory through which the canal is intended to pass. There was no stipulation of this kind in the Hay-Pauncefote convention; but, by the surviving portion of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, the two Governments agreed that neither would ever "occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America," nor attain any of the foregoing objects by protection offered to, or alliance with, any State or people of Central America.

(c) While the amendment reserving to the United States the right of providing for the defense of the canal is no longer pressed for, the first portion of rule 7, providing that "no fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent," has been omitted. The latter portion of the rule has been incorporated in rule 2 of the new draft, and makes provision for military police to protect the canal against lawlessness and disorder.

4. I fully recognize the friendly spirit which has prompted Mr. Hay in making further proposals for the settlement of the question, and while in no way abandoning the position which His Majesty's Government assumed in rejecting the Senate amendments, or admitting that the dispatch of the 22d February was other than a well-founded, moderate, and reasonable statement of the British case, I have examined the draft treaty with every wish to arrive at a conclusion which shall facilitate the construction of an interoceanic canal by the United States without involving on the part of His Majesty's Government any departure from the principles for which they have throughout contended.

5. In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

6. The proposal to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention is not, I think, inadmissible if it can be shown that sufficient provision is made in the new treaty for such portions of the convention as ought, in the interests of this country, to remain in force. This aspect of the case must be considered in connection with the provisions of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which have already been quoted, and article 8 referred to in the preamble of the new treaty.

Thus, in view of the permanent character of the treaty to be concluded and of the "general principle" reaffirmed thereby as a perpetual obligation, the high contracting parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass shall affect such "general principle" or release the high contracting parties, or either of them, from their obligations under the treaty, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization shall govern, so far as possible, all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus.

I would therefore propose an additional article in the following terms, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would probably be prepared to withdraw their objections to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty, or other change of circumstances, shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

7. The various points connected with the defense of the canal may conveniently be considered together. In the present draft the Senate amendment has been dropped, which left the United States at liberty to apply such measures as might be found "necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States." On the other hand the words "in time of war as in time of peace" are omitted from rule 1, and there is no stipulation, as originally in rule 7, prohibiting the erection of fortifications commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.

I do not fail to observe the important difference between the question as now presented to us and the position which was created by the amendment adopted in the Senate.

In my dispatch I pointed out the dangerous ambiguity of an instrument of which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures while another prohibited the erection of fortifications. It is most important that no doubt should exist as to the intention of the contracting parties. As to this, I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense the United States Government desire to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal, at any time when the United States may be at war, from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies. On the other hand, I conclude that, with the above exception, there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions, I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view, but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

It is also to be borne in mind that, owing to the omission of the words under which this country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain would be materially diminished.

This is a most important consideration. In my dispatch of the 22d February I dwelt upon the strong objection entertained by His Majesty's Government to any agreement under which, while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, Great Britain alone, in spite of her vast possessions on the American Continent and the extent of her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action, or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal. The same exception could not be taken to an arrangement under which, supposing that the United States, as the power owning the canal and responsible for the maintenance of its neutrality, should find it necessary to interfere temporarily with its free use by the shipping of another power, that power would thereupon at once and ipso facto become liberated from the necessity of observing the rules laid down in the new treaty.

8. The difficulty raised by the absence of any provision for the adherence of other powers still remains. While indifferent as to the form in which the point is met, I must emphatically renew the objections of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would therefore suggest the insertion in rule 1, after "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules." This addition will impose upon other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept, and will furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain.

As matters of minor importance, I suggest the renewal of one of the stipulations of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention by adding to rule 1 the words "such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable," and the adoption of "treaty" in lieu of "convention" to designate the international agreement which the high contracting parties may conclude.

Mr. Hay's draft, with the proposed amendments shown in italics, is annexed.

Draft of treaty relative to the construction of an interoceanic canal.

The United States of America and His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty the King of Great Britain and Ireland, etc., the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of said ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. 3–A. In view of the permanent character of this treaty whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty, or other change of circumstances, shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. 4. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within —— months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty, and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord 1901.

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther.

FOREIGN OFFICE, September 12, 1901.

SIR: I have to inform you that I have learned from Lord Pauncefote that Mr. Hay has laid before the President a memorandum a copy of which was forwarded to you in my dispatch of the 3d August.

Mr. McKinley regarded, as did Mr. Hay, the consideration shown to the last proposals of the United States Government relative to the interoceanic canal treaty as in the highest degree friendly and reasonable.

With regard to the changes suggested by His Majesty's Government, Mr. Hay was apprehensive that the first amendment proposed to clause 1 of article 3 would meet with opposition because of the strong objection entertained to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal. If His Majesty's Government found it not convenient to accept the draft as it stood, they might perhaps consider favorably the substitution for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules" the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and instead of "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." This, it seemed to Mr. Hay, would accomplish the purpose aimed at by His Majesty's Government.

The second amendment in the same clause, providing that conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable, was accepted by the President.

Coming to article numbered 3–A, which might be called article 4, Mr. Hay pointed out that the preamble of the draft treaty retained the declaration that the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention was not impaired. To reiterate this in still stronger language in a separate article, and to give to Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention what seemed a wider application than it originally had, would, Mr. Hay feared, not meet with acceptance.

If, however, it seemed indispensable to His Majesty's Government that an article providing for the contingency of a change in sovereignty should be inserted, he thought it might state that:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

This would cover the point in a brief and simple way.

In conclusion, Mr. Hay expressed his appreciation of the friendly and magnanimous spirit shown by His Majesty's Government in the treatment of this matter, and his hope that a solution would be attained which would enable the United States Government to start at once upon the great enterprise which so vitally concerned the whole world, and especially Great Britain, as the first of commercial nations.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 23, 1901.

MY LORD: I informed the United States chargé d'affaires to-day that His Majesty's Government had given their careful attention to the various amendments which had been suggested in the draft interoceanic canal treaty, communicated by Mr. Hay to your lordship on the 25th April last, and that I was now in a position to inform him officially of our views.

Mr. Hay had suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," etc., the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause, as a consequential amendment, to substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, which they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

We were also prepared to accept, in lieu of article 3–A, the new article 4 proposed by Mr. Hay, which, with the addition of the words "or countries" proposed in the course of the discussions here, runs as follows:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

I admitted that there was some force in the contention of Mr. Hay, which had been strongly supported in conversation with me by Mr. Choate, that article 3–A, as drafted by His Majesty's Government, gave to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty a wider application than it originally possessed.

In addition to those amendments, we proposed to add in the preamble, after the words "being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans," the words "by whatever route may be considered expedient," and "such ship canal" for "said ship canal" in the first paragraph of article 3, words which, in our opinion, seemed to us desirable for the purpose of removing any doubt which might possibly exist as to the application of the treaty to any other interoceanic canals as well as that through Nicaragua.

I handed to Mr. White a statement showing the draft as it originally stood and the amendments proposed on each side.

No. 7.

[Telegraphic.]

Lord Pauncefote to the Marquis of Lansdowne.

WASHINGTON, December 16, 1901.

Canal treaty ratified by 72 votes to 6 in Senate to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the amendment on page 53 be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that the amendment on page 52, line 18, has not been acted on.

Mr. WARREN. I understood that it had been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "$362,500" and in lieu thereof to insert "$462,500," so as to read:

In all, for the National Museum, $462,500.

Mr. BACON. I have been unavoidably out of the Chamber on account of duty upon the special committee connected with the impeachment proceedings. I simply want to ask the Senator from Wyoming if this matter relates to the suggestion which has come from the Smithsonian Institution as to what is needed in that regard?

Mr. WARREN. This covers a portion of the suggestion that came from there, and they are all of them within the estimates.

Mr. BACON. I took the liberty of making the inquiry because I had been asked to give some attention to it, but my other duties necessarily prevented me from doing so.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that the figures here represent the amount raised.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, to strike out lines 9 to 12, inclusive, in the following words:

Hereafter all plans and specifications for construction of buildings and bridges in the National Zoological Park shall be prepared by the municipal architect of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interstate Commerce Commission," on page 55, line 7, after the words "per day," to strike out the sum "$200,000" and insert "$250,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the payment of all authorized expenditures under the provisions of the act of February 17, 1911, "To promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," including such stenographic and clerical help to the chief inspector and his two assistants as the Interstate Commerce Commission may deem necessary and allowances in lieu of subsistence while away from official headquarters to persons whose traveling expenses are authorized by said act to be paid at not to exceed $4 per day, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under the War Department," subhead "Armories and arsenals," on page 55, after line 9, to insert:

Augusta Arsenal, Augusta, Ga.: For increasing the water supply and fire protection, $5,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 11, to insert:

Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa.: For dredging the Frankford Arsenal Creek, bordering on the Frankford Arsenal grounds, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 57, to insert:

Military posts: For continuing the construction of the necessary accommodations for the seacoast artillery in the Philippine Islands, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 3, to insert:

Keithley-Overton Railroad, Philippine Islands: For the construction and equipment of a railroad from Camp Overton to Camp Keithley, Mindanao, P. I., provided that the total cost of same shall not exceed $200,000, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 8, to insert:

Additional land, Fort Sam Houston, Tex.: For purchase of the tract of land now being leased from George W. Brackenridge, for drill purposes, consisting of 310 acres, more or less, lying just north of the newly purchased ground of the military reservation of Fort Sam Houston, Tex., and extending to the country road recently completed around the reservation, $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 15, to insert:

Bridge at Fort Riley, Kans.: For the construction of a steel bridge across the Kansas River, at Fort Riley, Kans., to render accessible the drill ground for the Cavalry at Smoky Hill Flats, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 19, to insert:

Grant of land by the State of Wyoming for enlargement of military reservation, Fort Mackenzie, Wyo.: The grant by the State of Wyoming by act of its legislature approved February 21, 1905, of title to and jurisdiction over the northeast quarter and northwest quarter of southeast quarter of section 18, township 56 north, range 84 west, of the sixth principal meridian, in the county of Sheridan and State of Wyoming, for the enlargement of the military reservation of Fort Mackenzie, in said State, is hereby accepted; and the State is hereby permitted to select and have patented to it, in compensation for said grant, an equal area of any of the unoccupied, nonmineral, untimbered public lands subject to entry within the State of Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 9, to insert:

Water system, Schofield Barracks, Territory of Hawaii: From the unexpended balance of the appropriation for "Water and sewers at military posts," fiscal year 1912, there is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, for the construction of the water system for the military reservation and post of Schofield Barracks, in the Territory of Hawaii, the sum of $175,000, or the entire unexpended balance, if less than that sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, going back to page 57, one amendment agreed to there reads as follows:

Keithley-Overton Railroad, Philippine Islands: For the construction and equipment of a railroad from Camp Overton to Camp Keithley, Mindanao, P. I., provided that the total cost of same shall not exceed $200,000, $50,000.

Is it proposed that we shall spend $200,000 to build a railroad from one point to another in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WARREN. The amount is limited to that amount. We are now paying over $150,000 a year to transport necessary Army supplies over this route. It seems a matter of the greatest economy that we should construct this road.

It has been recommended continuously by the War Department, and has been examined thoroughly. Formerly it was thought the expense would be $800,000 or $900,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the distance?

Mr. WARREN. It is about 22 miles.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think we can build a railroad of that length in the Philippines for $200,000?

Mr. WARREN. It is a narrow-gauge road.

Mr. OVERMAN. And equip it?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; sufficient to carry supplies, and so forth, of the Army.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand it is for the benefit of the Army now, not the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so; although without doubt it could be disposed of, if built, for other uses to good advantage.

Mr. BACON. The Senator indicates that the cost of this road is a relative saving compared with our present expenditures. What about the operation of the road?

Mr. WARREN. The operation of the road would show a very great economy, more so than in the building. Of course, the operation of the road is a matter of a few men where the operation now is at the cost of many men, in addition to the animals that are employed.

Mr. BACON. Is it designed to be entirely a military road?

Mr. WARREN. It is to be owned or operated by the military establishment. It will run on the property of the United States.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator mean by being owned by the military?

Mr. WARREN. It is to be built by the money we appropriate for the Army. Of course it will be United States property, and it is to be under the control of the Army.

Mr. BACON. But the title is what I speak of. The Senator spoke of it as being owned.

Mr. WARREN. The title to the railroad would be the same as the title to a military post.

Mr. BACON. Of course, the Senator does not mean that we now own the ground upon which the road is to be located.

Mr. WARREN. Most of the route is located on land which came to the United States through its Philippine connections, and where the road goes over private lands the damage has been estimated and is included in this cost.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I am not on the Appropriations Committee, and I have not the information which the learned Senator from Wyoming has; but having visited that country myself, and having been around different parts of it, it seems to me the demand for the construction of railroads on account of military purposes would not be limited to this railroad. If we are going to start on this business——

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator from Georgia been over this particular route?

Mr. BACON. I have not, and I am speaking generally. I visited those islands some years ago—not, of course every part of them, but from one military post to another—and I have some general idea about the necessity for intercommunication. It is only that that I had in my mind when I said that if we started upon the project of building railroads in all places in those islands where intercommunication between different military posts may be more economical if made by railroad transportation than it can be if made by other methods of transportation, we are entering upon a pretty wide field. I have no doubt that this may be the place where it is more important to have such communication than it would be at other places. I am ready to concede that in advance of a statement to that effect, which I presume the Senator from Wyoming will undoubtedly make, because if it were not of more importance it would not be selected for this purpose; but it is simply the general proposition of the construction of railroads in those islands for military purposes that struck me as being a new departure, so far as I know. Is not this the first time such a project has been undertaken?

Mr. WARREN. When the Senator has finished I shall explain the matter.

Mr. BACON. Well, of course, I supposed the Senator would indicate whether this was a new departure.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the Government of the United States has been for a number of years engaged in obtaining railroads in as many portions of the Philippines as have been found practicable, as the Senator knows, through certain guaranteed bonds the islands have issued. By reason of that most of the military posts, so far as the building of railroads is concerned, are well provided for. This particular route—and I might say to the Senator that I have been over the ground on horseback with a number of others—goes from Overton on the water up to Keithley, which is high on the mountain plains surrounding Lake Lanao, and is in the very center of the Moro country. At the time when I visited the Philippines, which was in 1905, the then Secretary of War, now President of the United States, arranged that as many Senators and Members of Congress as could should cross over that line. The proposition then was to spend perhaps seven or eight hundred thousand dollars to build a railroad because we could get no one else to take hold of the project. It was so entirely a military matter that the capitalists who were building the other railroads could not be interested. At that time the transportation was costing considerably over $200,000 a year. There has been an estimate made annually for several years, and particularly for the last two years the matter has been very earnestly and exhaustively examined under the governor and general officer who presides over that island. By the use of Moro labor, which has been found to be even more valuable and efficient for some uses than that of the Filipinos, it has been finally estimated by one of the able engineer officers of the Army that for somewhere between $165,000 and $200,000 a narrow-gauge railroad may be built on comparatively easy grades. That will not only include the railroad right of way, but also a right of way beside it from Overton, where we receive from the water transportation our supplies, up to the military posts which are in the mountains.

With that showing it seemed to the committee that it would be false economy to spend almost as much each year in freight expenditures as we should be required to expend in building the road. It is not a matter upon which snap judgment has been taken, but the reports in reference to it are voluminous and convincing, I will say to the Senator.

In my opinion, when that road shall have been built there can be developed a good deal of business. I believe the road can eventually be disposed of by the Government to private parties when it shall have been established; but whether it can be so disposed of or not, it is certainly in the line of economy for the Government to build it. It is not a new proposition that the Government may build its own small, short lines of transportation. We have done it in a number of places. In several large posts the Government builds and owns the entire railroad system, and railroad corporations build to the reservation lines to connect; also the Government builds and owns railroads from wharves to storehouses, in order to transport supplies cheaply.

Mr. BACON. But I should like to ask the Senator this: We have had in times past a large frontier where we had military posts between which communication was difficult and expensive.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator, there is nothing that is even comparable with this particular case. It is sui generis.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but what I had in mind was to inquire of the Senator whether there had ever been a single instance in the past history of this Government when we had built a railroad for the purpose of cheapening or facilitating intercourse between different military posts in this country?

Mr. WARREN. This is not between military posts. It is to supply from the water or ocean navigation transportation to a military post. We have done the same thing on a smaller scale in other cases. We have railroads to various places to reach warehouses from the water. You will find it in California, and you will find it in many other places.

Mr. BACON. I have misunderstood the Senator. I understood him to say that this was to reach a military post in the interior.

Mr. WARREN. So far as one terminal is concerned the road will start at the water where the freight is received for those military posts.

Mr. BACON. Yes. Now——

Mr. WARREN. But it is not intended simply to connect two military posts.

Mr. BACON. I understand; but that part of it is not material. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] suggests that it is to connect two camps; I do not know how that may be; but the point I am making is that in our large and long experience we have never done that in our own country. I am not going to make any point to have a record vote on it or anything of that kind, but I am very frank to say that it does not meet my approval. Of course I am only one, and when I say that I do not mean to exaggerate in any degree the exact limitations of my approval or disapproval; it is simply the disapproval of one Senator. I am not in favor, Mr. President, of our going into enterprises of this kind, either in this country or anywhere else, and much less am I in favor of going to remote parts of the earth to build a railroad, to be operated by the United States Government, with its officials and with its almost certain facilities for abuse of opportunity, to speak of it in the mildest language.

I wish very much, Mr. President, we had the attention of the Senate on this subject. It is certainly a most radical departure. It is one which will lead to complications in the future. What are we going to have there? Are we going to have a corps of civil railroad men operating a railroad?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, Mr. President, it is a mere matter of a couple of locomotives and sufficient cars to receive the freight and to handle it, exactly as is done in many places now where the Government owns its locomotives and owns its railroads for short distances, in order to deliver its own freight. In the last year nearly 8,000 tons of freight had to be moved in that country, and it cost $20 a ton to move it.

Mr. BACON. What character of freight was that?

Mr. WARREN. Freighting with horses and mules.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me. I asked what was the character of the freight?

Mr. WARREN. General supplies, food, clothing, and so forth, for military uses.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that furnishes an object lesson—another one of the many presented to us, although there are many more which could be presented but are absolutely unknown—of the folly of our undertaking, without any compensation or the hope of it in the future, to establish an empire on the other side of the world. I do not know whether this matter has been considered by the House of Representatives. Of course, ordinarily, under the rule, we are not permitted to discuss matters which occur in the other House, but here is a House bill and here is an amendment proposed to be put upon it by the Senate committee.

The Senator from Wyoming says that this matter has been recommended by the department for years. It is true I have never been on either the Military Committee or on the Appropriations Committee, but if it has ever before been suggested in the Senate I have never heard of it. While, as I have said, I have never been on either of these committees, and have never been on the Philippines Committee, this is a subject in which I have always taken the very deepest and keenest interest from its very inception. From the time, immediately after the Spanish-American War, when it was proposed that we go into this hair-brained undertaking, nothing has ever come up in the Senate, the name "Philippines" has never been mentioned, that my attention has not been attracted to it because of my long-continued interest in the subject.

I regret very much that the committee has seen proper to recommend this. A railroad is a permanent establishment. The building of one railroad leads to the building of others; the building of railroads leads to the organization of officials; the organization of officials leads to appointments and all those things which grow out of such a proposition. While I am not now in a position to effect and possibly could not effect anything if I were to attempt to do so, I sincerely hope that this proposition may not be enacted into law.

I can not reconcile myself, Mr. President, to the idea that we are to be for all time with this "body of death" hanging to us. That is what the possession of the Philippine Islands is—it is a "body of death." It is inconsistent with our institutions. It is an impossibility that those people shall ever be assimilated as a part of the country in which our institutions prevail; it is an impossibility that they can ever be a part of us or upon equal terms with us in any way; it is an impossibility that we can ever get back a part of the interest upon the principal that we have spent as to those islands, to say nothing of the hundreds of millions of dollars—and I am not speaking exaggeratedly—the hundreds of millions of dollars, the many hundreds of millions of dollars, they have cost us. I recollect, Mr. President, hearing the former Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar—if I am not in error in my recollection—I have heard him say on the floor of the Senate, when he was a member of it, that it had already cost us seven or eight hundred million dollars; and Mr. Hoar was a man not prone to make careless statements.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I am heartily in sympathy with the attitude of the Senator from Georgia, but I will say to him that the statement was $600,000,000. That, however, was many years ago.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that was many years ago, and I presume by this time it has reached a thousand million dollars. I should like to know how many dollars have ever gone into the United States Treasury or how many dollars have ever come into the pockets of any of the people of the United States in the way of legitimate trade or return on account of those islands.

I am not favorable, Mr. President, to a continuation of this policy and a further development of it. It may be that it costs more now to carry this freight by mules and horses than it would if the railroads were constructed, but the carrying of freight by mules and horses is a temporary matter while the construction of a railroad is a permanent matter.

I think, Mr. President, the statement of the Senator that it costs under the present arrangement the amount of money indicated by him to carry the comparatively small amount of freight necessary for supplying military posts in the Mindanao country carries upon its face a suggestion of the fact that there is waste and extravagance, if nothing worse, in the conduct of that business; and every rail that we put down is going to be that much more of an influence to make perpetual this burden upon us, to make it more likely that forever we are to have hung upon us what, I repeat, is a "body of death," and has been nothing else from the beginning.

I am not going to ask for any vote on the amendment, Mr. President, but it has got to be considered elsewhere, and I hope it will be so considered that it will never become a part of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I opposed this amendment in the committee for many of the reasons which the Senator from Georgia more ably and more lucidly than I could possibly state them has expressed. I introduced a resolution in the Senate at the beginning of the session asking the Secretary of War to report to Congress how much money had been spent in the Philippine Islands. I never could get a report on that resolution. For some reason the committee will not make a report on it. I remember also that in the last Congress I introduced a resolution asking how much money had been spent in the Philippines, but it sleeps the sleep of death in the committee. Prior to that time there was a similar resolution introduced asking how much money had been spent, but it also slept the sleep of death. We can not get any report as to the amount that has been spent; we do not know what that amount is, but we are safe in saying that we have already spent a billion dollars over there. No man knows how we have spent it or where we have spent it; and now we are going into the railroad business.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that there has been a failure to answer a resolution of the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. I introduced a resolution more than two months ago, and I understand the late lamented Senator from Georgia, Mr. Clay, also introduced a similar resolution, but we never have been able to get a report as to how much money we have spent in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CULBERSON. What I want to know is, did the resolution pass the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Philippines, but there has been no report on it; and that has been the case with every resolution introduced on that subject in the Senate since I have been here. We can not get the information, but we know the cost of those islands to the United States has been a thousand million dollars.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is present in the Chamber; he is a member of the Philippines Committee, and probably can throw some light upon whether or not this resolution is going to be reported out.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the suggestion is rather indefinite; so much so that it is not possible for me to make any statement in regard to the status of that resolution. Of course its status is easily ascertainable. A telephone message to the committee room or to the chairman of the committee, who was on the floor a few moments ago, might elicit the desired information.

Mr. CULBERSON. I invited the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the matter, because the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], was not on the floor when I spoke.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, I would require time enough to ascertain the facts; I would not care to state them from general recollection.

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought the Senator had them in his mind.

Mr. HEYBURN. I believe I have them in my mind; but I do not have them in my mind so accurately as to justify me making a statement on the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would be very much obliged if the Senator would look after the resolution and see that it is reported.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that it now costs to transport this freight $160,000 a year. I understand that the trail over which this freight is carried crosses mountains and that is where it is proposed to build a railroad. I think the Senator said the railroad was to be 20 miles long, that it is not to be on a level plain, but is to be constructed over mountains. I suppose they are going to have a cog railroad, something like they have on Pike's Peak, although I do not know, as I am not familiar with the country.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator misunderstood me. The railroad will not run over mountains, in the manner he indicates, but will start at the sea level and go to an elevation of some thousands of feet. The Senator may call them mountains if he chooses; however, there is no range of mountains there such as we have in this country, but, rather, a high plain where it is proposed to construct the railroad to the top of the hills or mountains that surround Lake Lanao.

There is no cog railroad projected, but a narrow-gauge railroad, and by making it cover a distance of, say 22 miles, although the distance, as the crow flies, is only 14 or 15 miles, the grade can be lessened, so that a steam railroad could operate successfully and economically.

Mr. OVERMAN. Although I am not an engineer, I will venture the assertion that a road only 20 miles long reaching an elevation of a thousand feet could not be built for $200,000, whether it be a narrow-gauge road or any other kind of a road.

We are entering upon the policy of the Government of the United States building a railroad in the Philippine Islands. I do not think we ought to do that; I do not think this Government has any business building railroads in the Philippine Islands, which we expect some of these days to give up. I say we have spent enough money there now, and I would rather go on spending the $160,000 to transport that freight 20 miles than to start the building of a railroad reaching an elevation of a thousand feet in 20 miles. It will cost, in my opinion, to build such a railroad a million dollars. I think the estimate given to the committee is an underestimate. It is proposed that the railroad shall not exceed in cost $200,000, but when the $200,000 has been spent they will come here again for another $200,000, and so on. It takes sometimes a hundred thousand dollars to build a mile of railroad across the mountains. The Senator says these hills are a thousand feet high, so I think they are pretty large hills.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the road has been carefully surveyed and can be built on a grade of about 2 per cent. Of course, I have no more interest in this question than has the Senator from North Carolina, and I know he will take it good-naturedly when I say that he is creating a bogy man to fight. There will be no part of this $50,000 used until they know that the road can be built within the limit of cost, except the expense of securing bids.

Heretofore I have refused even to ask that the proposition be considered. When the first estimates were made I considered they were too high, or, rather, that the total cost was above what I thought it expedient to spend; but this year, after years of study out there and the development of the country in a way that has rendered the procurement of supplies easier and has resulted in the breaking in, if I may use that term, of Moros as laborers, the proposition has been put on a reasonable basis. I think the Senator should not state that it will cost a million dollars or $2,000,000 to build the road.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not sure what it will cost, for I am not an engineer, but usually such projects start at a low estimate, which is increased from year to year, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WARREN. Sometimes that is true; but in this case, as I have said, there have been nearly two years of investigation, and the last reports, which carry the items of cost even to the spikes to be used, come from the most conservative engineers of the Army, and I have been convinced that we can get the road built inside of the limit proposed; but if we can not, I think there will be no part of the amount expended except, perhaps, in advertising for bids.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows, he and I having served on the Military Committee together, that there has not been a time when the department has not been asking for large sums of money for this purpose and that purpose, and consistently I have been fighting the spending of money in the Philippine Islands, except where it was necessary, as I believed, for fortifying what they call Corregidor Island; but as to going out into the interior and building railroads and other roads, I have always objected to that. We have been building roads over there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while the Senator from North Carolina and I may differ on the question of expenditures in the Philippines, and while the Senator from Georgia may be entirely right as to the burden of the Philippines, yet I do not believe we greatly differ when it comes to a question of putting our affairs there on a business basis of strict economy. We are there and we are not going to get out of there at once. The military posts are built; our troops are there, and freight is being received and taken over the roads. The railroad can be built very quickly, and in a year—certainly in less than two years—it would stand us nothing; it would be clear to us, for it will have paid for itself. If we are to give up the public property in the Philippines we are supposed to get something for it, and nothing would be better or more productive to those who might buy the property than a road of this kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. I gather from what the Senator says that it may be in the nature of a commercial proposition. We are proposing to build a railroad from the seacoast to a camp, and the Senator said, as I understood him—and I want to know if I am wrong—that probably we are going to establish a trade across the mountains with the Moros. So really back of it all—I am not charging the Senator with such a purpose—is there not probably something of the idea that they want to get a railroad over there to establish commercial relations with those people and make it a traffic line?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator there is nothing of that kind contemplated. I presume the Senator would not like to see us, after building the road, smother the country and not try to develop it. If that road shall result in developing the country, so much the better.

Mr. OVERMAN. But I do not propose to spend the money of the taxpayers of this country to develop the Philippine Islands in the interior.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator rather expend it for mules and horses which die along the line and find that because he does not want to build a railroad he is a great many thousand dollars out?

Mr. OVERMAN. I would rather spend for 10 years $160,000 a year buying mules and horses for the Government than to enter into the railroad business in the Philippine Islands. I do not know how long we are going to be there, but I should like to get away as soon as possible.

Mr. BACON. Especially, if the Senator will permit me, because there is no possible guaranty that this will be an end of it, but, on the contrary, there is every evidence to believe it is but an entering wedge for an expenditure which almost certainly will exceed the amount proposed, and there is no telling by how much it will exceed it.

Mr. WARREN. There is no way of meeting assertions of that kind. The committee has examined this matter as closely as possible, and, if my reputation is worth anything, I will say, so far as the presentation of this matter is concerned, that the estimate has been made fairly and squarely to cover the expenditure. So far as any influence I may have is concerned, I should not want a dollar expended, except perhaps for advertising for bids, unless the road can be built within the limit provided.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator would not make a statement unless it were true, because whatever he says is always true; but it is a very remarkable statement that it takes $160,000 a year to carry supplies for a little Army post 20 miles away.

Mr. WARREN. Why, Mr. President, "a little Army post" does not express it at all. It is a large Army post.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many men are stationed there?

Mr. WARREN. Not only is that a large Army post, but at the time I visited that country there were two posts on the margin of the lake.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many men are in that post?

Mr. WARREN. I should have to refer to the official list, of course, to ascertain that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are there 10,000?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, are there 5,000?

Mr. WARREN. Probably there are not half of 5,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, 2,500 men then; we will take that. It costs $160,000 to transport freight 20 miles to a place where there are only 2,500 men. I can not understand that.

Mr. WARREN. Well, $20 a ton would amount to something.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many tons—we would have to find out how many tons.

Mr. WARREN. About 8,000 tons in the last year.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I, like the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], opposed the adoption of this amendment in the committee. There is no question that the expenditures of the United States are extraordinary and in many cases, in my judgment, wholly unnecessary.

The former Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, when a Member of this body declared that the expenditures of the Government could be reduced $300,000,000 annually without injury to the public service. Now, whether that be an exaggeration or not, it certainly contains some proof that our expenses are far greater on the part of the Government than they should be.

Recognizing this fact, the House of Representatives at this session has begun a reduction of expenditures. The clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of that body has advised me that in the supply bills so far passed by the House of Representatives at this session the House has reduced expenditures more than $52,000,000 annually, as compared with the appropriations of last year.

Now, when we take up the sundry civil bill what do we find the House has done toward reducing expenditures in this bill alone? According to its report, it has reduced the expenditures in this bill as compared with the appropriations of last year something in excess of $33,000,000.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations has met that in a sense by bringing in a bill which reduces expenditures in this bill as compared with last year $27,000,000 and upward. But it has not met the House fully and fairly with reference to this particular bill. It has increased the expenditure of the Government in this bill alone over the bill as passed by the House by $5,545,000.

Not content, as I believe and as I assert, with unnecessarily expending money in the United States proper, it has in this amendment provided for the expenditure of $200,000 to begin the construction of a railroad in the Philippines, which ultimately of course will not belong to the United States; and, like the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I protest not only with reference to a large number of items—which I will point out before the bill passes—by which the Senate committee has increased the bill over the House, but that we are going out of the United States proper and starting upon an era of permanent improvements in the Philippine Islands by engaging in the extraordinary and dangerous practice of the Government building and owning a railroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The Secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the amendment which we have been discussing be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand; but that was done informally.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can move to reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 57, lines 4 to 8, inclusive, was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins
Bacon	Crawford	Jones	Pomerene
Bailey	Culberson	Kenyon	Root
Borah	Cullom	Lippitt	Simmons
Bourne	Cummins	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Fall	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Fletcher	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bryan	Gamble	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Burnham	Gardner	Massey	Stone
Burton	Gronna	Myers	Sutherland
Catron	Guggenheim	Oliver	Swanson
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Overman	Thornton
Clapp	Hitchcock	Page	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Wetmore

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 57, to insert the matter embraced in lines 4 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. OVERMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Kansas addressed the Chair, and it would seem that the call for the yeas and nays should be deferred until he got through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks that when a Senator asks for the yeas and nays it is proper to put the request.

Mr. BACON. I will not stop to discuss that now; but I do think that it is an improper practice, for the reason that the yeas and nays might be called upon a matter which would remain before the Senate for two or three weeks, and the purpose of the Constitution in requiring the yeas and nays is that those who are present and are going to vote on the question shall, at the demand of one-fifth of those who are present and going to vote, be required to go on record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, when a Senator asks for the yeas and nays, the first thing to be done is to determine whether there is a second to the request.

Mr. OVERMAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not understand that a call for the yeas and nays prevents any Senator from speaking thereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not in the least. The question is, Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire why the money that is to be expended for a railroad in the Philippine Islands should not be paid out of the Philippine treasury instead of out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. That will probably be the ultimate outcome; but, under the relations between the two, that could not be done now, because for the present the railroad will be in the exclusive ownership of the United States and for its exclusive use.

I want to say to the Senator and to all Senators who were not in the Chamber when this matter was being discussed, that this is a matter of building what you might call a switch track from the sea, where the freight is received, to the military posts that are on Lake Lanao. This is restricted to an expenditure of $200,000. We have statements that have been almost years in preparation from the best engineers of the Army which state it can be built inside of $200,000. We are now expending from $150,000 a year to two hundred and odd thousand dollars a year for hauling freight over that road. So it is a matter of economy, and the road will pay for itself inside of two years.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that expenditures for permanent improvements in the Philippine Islands ought to be paid for out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. WARREN. It must come from there ultimately, but there is no way now by which it can be handled in that manner. It would be like an emplacement for fortifications. Everyone contemplates that those fortifications, when we turn them over to the Philippine Government, will be paid for by that Government, but now they are paid for by the United States, as the Senator knows.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask what is to become of this railroad? Is it to be open for public travel or simply for the use of the Government?

Mr. WARREN. That is getting a little ahead of what we are now contemplating. As the Senator knows, the United States Government and the Philippine Government have their arrangements, and, in my judgment, they have conducted business very well in the last few years. The building of this road and its present use would be exclusively, we will say, by the United States. But I have no doubt when the road is opened it would be the same as any other highway or railroad—there will be arrangements made by its management under which the civil government of the Philippines will undoubtedly participate.

For instance, this very section of country in which it is proposed to build this road is presided over by a brigadier general of the United States Army as the departmental commander. The same officer is civil governor of Mindanao. There seems to be no difficulty in the management there; and that will take care of itself, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is a very serious matter for us to enter upon a system of Government-owned railroads in the Philippine Islands, and upon that question Congress has distinctly spoken that it would not enter upon such a policy.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, I think, was not in the Senate Chamber when I stated that the Philippines were proceeding to get railroads in other ways, as the Senators know, through the guaranty of bonds, and so forth. But this proposed road is of the nature of those short stub or spur railroads that are owned now by the Army and Navy, which extend from the sea to the warehouses or to a camp or a post, as the case may be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It strikes me that that is a considerable railroad.

Mr. WARREN. It will cost $200,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is to be 20 miles in length, I understand, and there now being a law which provides for the construction of railroads in the Philippine Islands by permitting the Philippine Government to guarantee the interest upon the bonds, suggests to me that where there is any legitimate need for a railroad and any profitable use for a railroad, it will be built.

Mr. WARREN. Do you think they would build a railroad for the Government between a loading point and a post?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Government is now expending, as the Senator says, over $100,000 a year in freight transportation, and the road could be built for $200,000 by private capital, and could secure from the Government $100,000 a year for the transportation of freight, I believe private enterprise would build it, particularly as the bonds would be guaranteed by the Philippine Government.

Mr. WARREN. I wish I had the faith that the Senator has with regard to how easily capital can be had for those remote regions in those remote islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe I express the strong sentiment of this country against having the Government make permanent investments of this character, unless a better showing is made as to the need for them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask a question for information? I was unavoidably out of the Chamber when the Senator made his explanation and when this question was discussed. For my own information I want to ask whether the railroad is to be a part of our defense system—our military system—in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WARREN. In the sense that it is a means of transportation from the sea to our troops; yes.

Mr. REED. Is this intended to be a permanent post, or is it simply a post that is maintained there to keep the peace in the islands until such time as we shall relinquish our control?

Mr. WARREN. It is a permanent post. It is in the Moro country, where, as I presume the Senator knows, there are different tribes, and where in early times there were all kinds of differences and all kinds of government. They had war between themselves, one upon another. It was the most dangerous country we had to enter when we took the islands. Our work there has been perhaps the most successful of our work anywhere in bringing about relative peace and turning the inhabitants into various lines of industry. It is purely a matter of economy.

As I stated before, surely the chairman of the committee has no more interest in the matter than any other Senator. But at present we are bound to spend not $100,000, as the Senator from Nebraska states, but from $150,000 to $200,000 a year for freight to this post. At one time it was over $200,000 a year. The lowest offer they have now for the next year or two is $20 a ton, and the lowest estimate they can make is 7,500 tons a year, which would be an even $150,000 for the wagon transportation over this route.

If by the expenditure of $200,000 we can at once almost obliterate that charge and bring it down to a mere nominal one, it seems to me good economy, whatever may become of the road after the Government has finished using it for the part of the Army located there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator had finished. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. REED. Has there been any estimate or request in reference to this matter from the War Department?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, I think, was out during my statement.

Mr. REED. I was out. I am sorry to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. In the first place, these estimates were made as early as 1904 or 1905. When the so-called Taft party went to the islands the local authorities were so anxious about the matter that they arranged a trip, and a number of Senators and Members—myself included—went across that country on horseback and examined it thoroughly and spent a night at Lake

Lanao. The estimates then called for between $700,000 and $800,000. The War Department asked then that we build the road. But it seemed too much, and in my service on the Military Affairs Committee and also on the Committee on Appropriations I was not then ready to take up the enterprise.

But later on, I think during the last year, the War Department has had another estimate made by what it believes to be one of the most capable men in the service, one of the Army engineers.

The estimates for this road have been made annually ever since 1905, I think. The War Department has not only an estimate made, but in its evidence before the committee, through its head and bureau chief, it insisted that if we wanted economical management we should provide this railroad.

Mr. REED. Just one further question. Generally the internal improvements of the islands are now being taken care of by the islands themselves, are they not, our Government guaranteeing the bonds?

Mr. WARREN. Certain of them are; yes.

Mr. REED. If this proposed road is for the maintenance of the peace of the islands and is also in the nature of a permanent improvement, why should it not be paid for by the government of the islands, instead of by this Government?

Mr. WARREN. This is a matter of a different nature. As I say, it is for the exclusive use of the Government at present and may be said to be for the purpose of controlling the very people that would be taxed if the road were paid for by local taxation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only wanted to say a single word in regard to the nature of the proposed road. It is a road which is proposed to be built in the island of Mindanao. The island of Mindanao is the great island on the southern border of the archipelago. It has no connection with Luzon. It is hundreds of miles away from Manila and from all that region where the commercial railroads are. It is the island of the Moros, who are Mohammedans in religion, and who are a wild and more or less dangerous people, under the government of their own datos or sultans.

The prospect of the road having any commercial value—which I recognize under present conditions would be almost a crime—is so slight that I think it need not be regarded. The island is largely a tropical wilderness. It is absolutely necessary to maintain a military post there. This is a mere means of communication for the safety of the military post, and for the cheap transportation of supplies thereto.

Having had familiarity for a good many years with Philippine matters, I simply wanted to emphasize the point that this is a matter that in no way concerns the commercial development of the islands, in which the other railroad system is involved.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may, I should like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator appears to be very well posted upon the character of this island, as he is upon all questions upon which he speaks.

Mr. LODGE. I was for 15 years chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, and therefore picked up some knowledge of the islands.

Mr. REED. If the island is inhabited by barbarians and savages, and has no commercial possibilities, I should like to inquire why we are maintaining an Army post there, and why we should build railroads. Why do we not get out and turn it over to these Mohammedans?

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it had no commercial possibilities; far from it. I think very likely it has considerable commercial possibilities, now that we have established and maintained peace there. It is part of the archipelago. It is necessary, in the interest of all the islands, to have good order preserved there, which now is preserved there, and which undoubtedly is leading to some commercial development. I was speaking of the general condition of the island.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator a question. It has been stated that practically the only business of this railroad will be for military purposes.

Mr. LODGE. So I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Wyoming has stated that the number of tons carried over the road annually will be 7,000 tons. Figuring 20 tons to the car, that is 350 carloads a year. Is the Senator in favor of building a railroad to carry less than 1 carload a day?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am in favor of building the railroad as an adjunct to a military post. My point, which seems to have escaped the Senator from Nebraska, was that this was not a commercial enterprise. It is a matter of military protection. I thought the Senator from Nebraska was haunted by the idea that in the remote future somebody might make some money out of it, and I wanted to disabuse his mind of the idea that there was any possibility of such a crime as that being contemplated. I do not think anybody is going to make any money out of it. It is a matter of military protection.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. If for any reason we should have occasion to abandon that post, or that island, either, does the Senator think we could dispose of the road at an advantageous price?

Mr. LODGE. Why, certainly, because it would be of governmental value. Nobody with any commercial sense would build a road there. It is proposed to be built for the protection of the military post and for military purposes, and it would be valuable to any Government which took over the islands.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. That country was considered important enough, both as to government and as to future development, for the Spanish nation to maintain communication through it. In fact, they carried through it to the lake, on mules and horses, at great expense, the materials for two steamboats, and constructed them on the lake. When we had our differences with Spain we captured and sunk those boats. Since then we have raised them, and they are now plying on the lake. It is not a country that is incapable of development, because it has great natural resources. But if peace is to be maintained there, and one tribe is to be kept from annihilating another, there must be some strong hand of government there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will allow me, he does not differ with me in my proposition that this road is primarily a military adjunct?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all; it is entirely so.

Mr. REED. What is the objection to letting one tribe of that kind of people annihilate the other?

Mr. LODGE. No doubt something may be said for that view.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Missouri seems to be more bloodthirsty than he was before he went to Baltimore.

Mr. REED. Oh, no, Mr. President. I am just trying to qualify myself for association with some of the gentlemen who did not go to Chicago.

Mr. WARREN. That is useless.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the chairman of the committee to state that in 1904 the War Department estimated that the expenditure required here was about $800,000. If we have had a saving of $600,000 since 1904, may we not get some further advantage if we postpone the matter another year or two?

Mr. WARREN. That is begging the question. In the first place, I alluded to 1904 in a loose manner. When the estimates are as carefully made as they are now, with every item shown, an argument of that kind does not have any effect.

Mr. BACON. I understand the question to be upon the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment recommended by the committee, beginning with line 4, on page 57. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and noticing his absence I withhold my vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 2, to insert:

For widening and improving surface of roads, and for building bridges and culverts, from the belt-line road to the western border; from The Thumb Station to the southern border; and from the Lake Hotel Station to the eastern border, all within Yellowstone National Park, to make such roads suitable and safe for animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles, $77,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee what the expression "motor-propelled vehicles in the Yellowstone Park" means? I notice that this appropriation of $77,000 is for the purpose of making roads "suitable and safe for animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles." I understood that Government regulations prohibit motor-propelled vehicles in the parks.

Mr. WARREN. That is true, but let me say to the Senator that the belt line in the park is, of course, surrounded by a large portion of the park, practically unused and untraveled except as to the roads of entrance from north, south, east, and west. Then there is a forest reserve still outside of and almost entirely surrounding the park. The travel from the south, east, and west, as well as from the north, is becoming heavy, and there is nothing there, as to the first three mentioned, but wooden waterway bridges and sluices and narrow, incomplete roadways. These roads are narrow and must be repaired, and in repairing it is thought best to make them wide enough so that they can be utilized hereafter for motors from the outer park lines to the inside much-traveled belt line, but not yet on the belt line. This has been recommended by the committee after consideration of the Interior Department and the War Department replies to Senate resolutions.

While the Secretary of the Interior expressed himself as opposed to motors on the belt line in the park at present, he says he believes that the time will come when motors may be admitted, after roads have been properly reconstructed.

This proposed widening, however, covers but a small fraction, considering the total number of miles of traveled roads. It goes from the edge of the timber reserve to the belt line in three different directions that are very much traveled.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The regulations will still remain in force against automobiles in the park?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; there is no present change proposed in that regard.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 9, to insert:

Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.: For the construction of a wagon road and the necessary bridges through Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., together with a system of tanks and water-supply pipes to provide for sprinkling, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the War Department published as House Document No. 328, Sixty-second Congress, second session, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask if the work of that commission has not been practically finished?

Mr. WARREN. We are informed that it has not been finished. It is nearing completion. The chairman of the board—Gen. Ernst, I believe, is the chairman—stated to the committee that he would endeavor to finish it within this amount, and perhaps save some portion of this appropriation. There is much paper work yet to be done, and some of the monuments and landmarks are not yet up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What monuments does this Waterways Commission erect?

Mr. WARREN. Monuments are erected oftentimes to make a point on the water. Monuments on land oftentimes are used in triangulating into some water point, and monuments are erected on islands and river and lake borders.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can the Senator give us the personnel of the commission as it is now organized?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I have it at hand now, but I shall obtain it in a moment or two.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. This is not the Canadian commission. This is the International Waterways Commission.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that they have nothing to do with the erection of monuments.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the International Waterways Commission, which was created under congressional legislation, was charged under the boundary treaty with the work of laying out and marking the boundary between the United States and Canada on the Great Lakes.

Mr. WARREN. That is, the water part of it.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is an entirely different commission, I think.

Mr. WARREN. No; the Senator is thinking of another commission, which evidently has been confounded with this one. This is the earlier commission, and is presided over—the American part of it—by Gen. Ernst.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator mean to say that the commission operating between Canada and the United States is called the International Waterways Commission?

Mr. WARREN. I understand it is a commission as arranged between the two Governments to carry out treaties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I supposed that was called the joint commission, not the international commission. I supposed the international commission was the commission we had investigating——

Mr. WARREN. We have another commission, called the International Joint Commission, of which Mr. Tawney, formerly of the House of Representatives, is a member, and of which one of our beloved former Members, now dead, was a member; but, as I said, that is entirely different.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator give me the personnel of that commission?

Mr. WARREN. I can not now, just at this moment.

Mr. BURTON. I do not remember the name of the third member. The original members were Gen. Oswald H. Ernst; Mr. George Clinton, a lawyer, of Buffalo, N. Y.; and Mr. George Wisner, an engineer, of Detroit, Mich. Mr. Wisner is now deceased, and a professor of engineering in Cornell University was appointed in his place.

I will state that this commission is somewhat confused with the latter one. It was appointed under the act passed in 1902, paragraph 4 of the river and harbor act of that year, and commenced its work in 1905. It has had to do with quite a number of important investigations, such as the effect upon the water level of the Great Lakes of the diversion caused by the Chicago Drainage Canal. It was specifically authorized and directed to investigate upon the feasibility of constructing a dam at the lower end of Lake Erie.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the title of that commission?

Mr. BURTON. It is called the International Waterways Commission.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The same title?

Mr. WARREN. No; not the same title. I now can give the membership: Chairman, Brig. Gen. O. H. Ernst, United States Army (retired); George Clinton, Buffalo, N. Y.; E. E. Haskell, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.; secretary, W. E. Wilson, Buffalo, N. Y.

The Canadian members are: Chairman, Sir George C. Gibbons, K. C., London, Ontario; Louis Coste, Ottawa, Ontario; William J. Stewart, Ottawa, Ontario; and their secretary is Thomas Côté, Ottawa, Ontario.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is that called the International Waterways Commission?

Mr. WARREN. It is the International Waterways Commission. That is the official title.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then we have another one operating under the same name.

Mr. GALLINGER. The title of the latter commission is "The International Joint Commission" as laid down in the Congressional Directory, and I think that is correct.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can the Senator in charge of the bill give us a statement as to the expenditures of this International Waterways Commission last year?

Mr. WARREN. The appropriations have been $20,000 a year.

Mr. CULBERSON. This commission has been in existence since 1902, I understand, when the law was passed. That is 10 years, and it has not concluded its labors yet.

Mr. BURTON. I will state that it commenced its work in 1905. There was a delay by the British or Canadian Government in making the appointment of its members of the commission, there being some difference of opinion as to the exact scope of their work. The Canadian Government thought that they had a right to submit certain disputed questions pertaining to the boundary waters near the Pacific coast, while our Government thought their jurisdiction was limited to the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence and connecting waters. Their work was not commenced before the year 1905, and perhaps not until a little later. I will say for the commission they have performed some very important duties.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is not the International Joint Commission now performing practically the same duties, so far as Canada is concerned, as this International Waterways Commission?

Mr. WARREN. It is entirely different. This was for the waters and islands, which one witness described as islands in the river that were as the books on the table. When the Senator is through I should like to have read a part of the letter of Gen. Ernst, which throws some light upon the work.

Mr. CULBERSON. Has the chairman of the committee any information as to when the labors of this commission will be concluded? It is admitted that it has been in existence now for six years.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator says that upon what authority?

Mr. CULBERSON. I say it upon the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. WARREN. That is probably correct. The chairman of the committee was unadvised as to the time, although knowing that it preceded the other one.

Gen. Ernst says here:

> I was not called before the House Appropriations Committee when they were preparing the bill, and therefore had no opportunity to answer any objections which might be raised to the item. Indeed, I am not perfectly certain as to what those objections are, but it is my understanding that there are two.
> One is that the commission has had time enough to complete its work. In answer to this I can only say that any delays which may have occurred have been unavoidable. They are only such as must always occur where two independent coordinate bodies, like the two sections of an international commission, are working together. All of the work has been completed except that relating to two subjects, the regulation of Lake Erie and marking the international boundary. In spite of all efforts to hasten the work it will require one year and perhaps part of another to complete the relocation and marking of the boundary.
> The other objection is, as I understand it, that the work may well be transferred to the new international joint commission and completed by them. This is not possible for a variety of reasons. In the first place, it is almost wholly technical engineering work, and in its present incomplete condition could not be transferred, even to the most competent engineers, without great loss of time and waste of labor already put upon it. In the second place, the new commission is organized upon a different footing from the old one. The personnel of the latter is, by law, two-thirds of it engineers, while the new commission has not a single engineer member. It is no reflection upon the new commission to say that they are not competent to do the work. Finally, article 4 of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, dated April 11, 1908, of which I inclose a copy, provides that "the existing international waterways commission" shall do this boundary work; that is, the work must be done by a commission of whom the majority are engineers. To transfer it to the international joint commission would be to violate the treaty.
> It seems to me that aside from the injury to the work itself which must result from a sudden stoppage, there is here a question of international courtesy. We first invited Great Britain to join us in creating the International Waterways Commission, and later on we joined with her in a treaty assigning to them an important piece of work. Are we at liberty to put a sudden stop to that work, by simply refusing to go on with it, without warning to her?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming what is the pay of these commissioners.

Mr. WARREN. I could not tell the Senator that without looking it up.

Mr. CUMMINS. Do we pay them by the year or by the day?

Mr. WARREN. Of course the retired officer of the Army is getting, so far as I know, only his retired pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is this appropriation intended to pay them?

Mr. WARREN. It is to pay their employees and such members, doubtless, as are not provided for otherwise.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not know how much we are paying or how much of the time they are actually employed?

Mr. WARREN. I have not the details here, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the chances are that all of them except the officer of the Army give most of their time to other occupations.

Mr. WARREN. Of that the chairman would hardly know, as they are all strangers to him, living at distant points.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is not intended to be a criticism, but I have no doubt that they have been paid a great deal more than they ever earned, not simply because they are all eminent men, but because they are paid for a great deal of time that they do not give to the work of the United States. They all ought to be paid by the day and ought to render such an account as to show the time actually expended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the assurances which have been given to him for an early report, whether he would be willing to add to this paragraph "final report to be made within one year, or before June 30, 1913"?

Mr. WARREN. If this were a commission entirely on our own land and immediately and only under our own orders, I would probably not object; but here is a commission one-half of which are subjects of another country, and I do not believe it would be competent for us to express it in that way. Of course, we might express a desire for an early completion, but I hardly think we ought to make a drastic order of that kind in an international matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think such a hint to the commission would be wise.

Mr. WARREN. Make it a hint, but not an order, then.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think one of the crying evils, if not scandals, of our Government has been the appointment of such commissions at high salaries with little work and with no supervision, and they are allowed to run along from year to year and from ocean to ocean and to extend their own time.

It seems to me when Congress makes this appropriation, after having received, as the Senator from Wyoming states he has received, an assurance that the final result can be reached within a year, we may well——

Mr. WARREN. No; the Senator must have had his attention attracted elsewhere when I read the letter. Gen. Ernst states that he hoped to accomplish it within a year, or, at least, in the early part of another year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say before that time.

Mr. WARREN. I said before reading the letter that Gen. Ernst hoped to do it inside of a year, and I still say that; but he qualifies the statement in his letter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly, if there were some supervision somewhere, the work could be expedited a great deal. I believe this is one of the cases when a suggestion of this sort would be proper. I therefore move to amend the amendment by adding "the final report to be made within one year."

I want to say by way of explanation, Mr. President, that that can be later amended by Congress if necessary. Being inserted in an appropriation bill, I believe it will produce the desired result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 85, line 3, in the committee amendment, after the numerals, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words:

The final report to be made within one year.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not press that amendment. I think it would be regarded as a discourtesy to these gentlemen, who are of very high character, on the American side of the commission and by the Canadian members of the commission. We have not any evidence at all that they have not been entirely diligent in the performance of their work. Senators will realize that, although the boundary lines between the adjacent countries are established, as the population increases and the country in the neighborhood of the boundary becomes more thickly settled and communication and commerce increase it becomes continually necessary to make more definite the position of the line. A line passing through a wilderness might well be described in general terms, but when people come to build their homes and to carry on their business it must be marked out on the surface of the earth with certainty and particularity.

All along the three thousand and odd miles of boundary between the United States and Canada we have been reaching that position. A few years ago it was found very essential that measures should be taken to mark out on the surface of the earth with certainty the lines between New York and Canada. A treaty was made for that purpose and different agencies were availed of to do that work according to the nature of the line which was to be established. For some part of the line surveyors were to be employed, and for the part of the line which passes through the waterways of the Great Lakes both countries agreed that the existing commission, which was very familiar with the waterways and which was composed of two engineers and one lawyer, was the best agency that could be adopted for the purpose of doing the work. If we had not taken that we would have had to create a new agency to do it; but we had these gentlemen; so we formally agreed to impose upon that existing commission the duty of marking out this line. They are empowered by the treaty—

To ascertain and reestablish accurately the location of the international boundary line, beginning at the point of its intersection with the St. Lawrence River near the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, as determined under articles 1 and 6 of the treaty of August 9, 1842, between the United States and Great Britain, and thence through the Great Lakes and communicating waterways to the mouth of Pigeon River, at the western shore of Lake Superior in accordance with the description of such line in article 2 of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, dated September 3, 1873, and of a portion of such line in article 2 of the treaty of August 9, 1842, aforesaid, and as described in the joint report dated June 18, 1822, of the commissioners appointed under article 6 of the treaty of December 24, 1814, between the United States and Great Britain, with respect to a portion of said line and as marked on charts prepared by them and filed with said report, and with respect to the remaining portion of said line as marked on the charts adopted as treaty charts of the boundary under the provisions of article 2 of the treaty of 1842, above mentioned, with such deviation from said line, however, as may be required on account of the cession by Great Britain to the United States of the portion of Horse Shoe Reef, in the Niagara River, necessary for the lighthouse erected there by the United States in accordance with the terms of the protocol of a conference held at the British foreign office December 9, 1850, between the representatives of the two Governments and signed by them, agreeing upon such cession; and it is agreed that wherever the boundary is shown on said charts by a curved line along the water the commissioners are authorized in their discretion to adopt in place of such curved line a series of connecting straight lines, defined by distances and courses and following generally the course of such curved line, but conforming strictly to the description of the boundary in the existing treaty provisions, and the geographical coordinates of the turning points of such line shall be stated by said commissioners, so as to conform to the system of latitudes and longitudes of the charts mentioned below.

I ask the attention of the Senator from Nebraska particularly to this part of the treaty—

And the said commissioners shall, so far as practicable, mark the course of the entire boundary line, located and defined as aforesaid, by buoys and monuments in the waterways and by permanent range marks established on the adjacent shores or islands, and by such other boundary marks and at such points as in the judgment of the commissioners it is desirable that the boundary should be so marked.

Then they are to indicate the marks on the charts.

Mr. President, the establishment of this line and the establishment of monuments and range lines is of very great importance, because there arise questions of jurisdiction, the seizure of persons violating the laws on either side of the line, the limit to which fishermen may go, and a great number of acts which relate to the jurisdiction of the different countries. It is an inconspicuous and uninteresting thing to do, but nothing is of greater importance to the carrying out of this series of treaties which provide for fixing with definiteness and certainty the line between the sovereignty of Canada and the sovereignty of the United States.

The two countries have agreed to avail themselves of the agency of this commission to lay out this portion of the line. In view of the difficulties that exist, the questions to be discussed and settled, and the enormous range of country over which they act, I do not think we ought to assume that they have been negligent or dilatory in the performance of their duty; and I should be very sorry to see the Senate put into this appropriation bill anything which tended to express a judgment of that nature.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Could the Senator suggest any other language which would indicate to the commission that Congress would like to have a report made within a definite time?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think this discussion will be suggestion enough to gentlemen of the character that compose this commission.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator realizes that when a commission of this kind is appointed without any time limit, with absolutely no suggestion that there is any haste whatsoever, it has been our universal experience that they have dragged on year after year, with great deliberation, to say the least. The very argument which the Senator from New York makes as to the importance of having these boundary lines demarked and laid out and defined and monumented is an argument in favor of doing it now, and not permitting it to drag along indefinitely through the years.

Mr. ROOT. I think we well might put in a provision directing the American commissioners to make a report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have such a provision written and hope the Senator from Nebraska will accept it. It is as follows:

Provided, That report as to the progress of the work be made by the American commissioners to Congress at the beginning of the next session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In view of the fact that this discussion will also be taken in connection with that, I accept that amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have remarked frequently, since I have had the honor to be a Member of this body, on the number of commissions which have been appointed to assist the Government of the United States in carrying out its obligations and otherwise performing its functions; but I do not believe that I have ever seen commissions so directly the duplicate of each other as are the two commissions which are now under discussion. I want to emphasize that by asking the reporter to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what appears in the edition of the Congressional Directory of April, 1912, at page 265, about the International Waterways Commission and what appears at page 267 of the same publication under the head of "The International Joint Commission," the duties of each of which have reference to the boundary lying between the United States and Canada, each of them having American commissioners and Canadian commissioners, each of them having an office at the expense of the Government of the United States, one in the Westory Building and the other in the Southern Building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

[Room 606 Westory Building, 605 Fourteenth Street. Phone Main 7343.]

Brig. Gen. O. H. Ernst, United States Army (retired), chairman, 1321 Connecticut Avenue; George Clinton, Prudential Building, Buffalo, N. Y.; Prof. E. E. Haskell, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.; W. E. Wilson, Federal Building, Buffalo, N. Y., secretary.

CANADIAN MEMBERS.

Sir George C. Gibbons, K. C., London, Ontario, chairman; Louis Coste, Ottawa, Ontario; William J. Stewart, Ottawa, Ontario; Thomas Côté, Ottawa, Ontario, secretary.

THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION.

[Southern Building, Fifteenth and H Streets. Phone Main 3764.]

Created by treaty with Great Britain, and having jurisdiction over all cases involving the use or obstruction or diversion of waters forming the international boundary or crossing the boundary between the United States and Canada.

UNITED STATES SECTION.

Hon. James A. Tawney, Winona, Minn, chairman; Hon. Frank S. Streeter, Concord, N. H.; Hon. George Turner, Spokane, Wash.; L. White Busbey, Washington, D. C., secretary.

CANADIAN SECTION.

Th. Chase Casgrain, K. C., Montreal, Quebec, chairman; Henry A. Powell, K. C., St. John, New Brunswick; Charles A. Magrath, Ottawa, Ontario; Lawrence J. Burpee, Ottawa, Ontario, secretary.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want further to emphasize the fact that the first of these commissions has been in existence since 1905, while the new commission has only just about begun its labors.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], as amended by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], may have the effect of expediting this work, and that at least we may have an opportunity of getting rid of one of these commissions, which are nothing more, in my judgment, however you may disguise it by technicalities, than duplicates one of the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before leaving this matter, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD in full the letter of Gen. Ernst, of which I read a part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed as requested.

The letter referred to is as follows:

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF CHAIRMAN AMERICAN SECTION,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1912.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SIR: Among the estimates submitted by the War Department for the coming year was an item of $20,000 for the support of the International Waterways Commission. This item has been omitted in the sundry civil bill, where it is usually carried, and that bill will reach the Appropriations Committee of the Senate without it.

I was not called before the House Appropriations Committee when they were preparing the bill, and therefore had no opportunity to answer any objections which might be raised to the item. Indeed, I am not perfectly certain as to what those objections are, but it is my understanding that there are two.

One is that the commission has had time enough to complete its work. In answer to this I can only say that any delays which may have occurred have been unavoidable. They are only such as must always occur where two independent coordinate bodies, like the two sections of an international commission, are working together. All of the work has been completed except that relating to two subjects, the regulation of Lake Erie and marking the international boundary. In spite of all efforts to hasten the work, it will require one year and perhaps part of another to complete the relocation and marking of the boundary.

The other objection is, as I understand it, that the work may well be transferred to the new International Joint Commission and completed by them. This is not possible, for a variety of reasons. In the first place, it is almost wholly technical engineering work, and in its present incomplete condition could not be transferred even to the most competent engineers without great loss of time and waste of labor already put upon it. In the second place, the new commission is organized upon a different footing from the old one. The personnel of the latter is by law two-thirds of it engineers, while the new commission has not a single engineer member. It is no reflection upon the new commission to say that they are not competent to do the work. Finally, article 4 of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, dated April 11, 1908, of which I inclose a copy, provides that "the existing International Waterways Commission" shall do this boundary work. That is, the work must be done by a commission of whom the majority are engineers. To transfer it to the International Joint Commission would be to violate the treaty.

It seems to me, that aside from the injury to the work itself which must result from a sudden stoppage, there is here a question of international courtesy. We first invited Great Britain to join us in creating the International Waterways Commission, and later on we joined with her in a treaty assigning to them an important piece of work. Are we at liberty to put a sudden stop to that work by simply refusing to go on with it without warning to her?

I have had no time to consult my colleagues, but I venture to urge on their behalf, as I do on my own, that the item of $20,000 for the International Waterways Commission be placed in the sundry civil bill by the Senate.

Yours, very respectfully, O. H. ERNST,
Brigadier General, United States Army, Retired,
Chairman of American Section, International Waterways Commission.

Mr. WARREN. Before proceeding to the next amendment, I wish to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee to come in on page 86, at the end of line 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

Columbia Hospital: The preparation of plans and specifications for a new building for Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, for which appropriation was made in the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1912, and the expenditure of said appropriation shall be under the direction and supervision of the president of the board of directors of Columbia Hospital and of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Medical Department," on page 92, line 3, after the words "Central Branch," to strike out the sum "$40,000" and insert "$48,000," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $48,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, line 6, after the words "In all," to strike out the sum "$432,360" and insert $440,360," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $440,360.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 19, to insert:

For sewage disposal plant, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 20, to insert:

For repairs to barracks, $8,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 21, to insert:

For increase and improvement of water supply, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, in line 25, after the words "In all," to strike out the sum "$401,000" and insert "$432,500," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $432,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 12, after the words "Central Branch," to strike out the sum "$40,000" and insert "$42,000," so as to make the clause read:

Mountain Branch, Johnson City, Tenn.: For current expenses, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $42,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 24, after the words "In all," to strike out the sum "$291,500" and insert "$293,500," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $293,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 95, line 3, after the words "Central Branch," to strike out the sum "$23,000" and insert "$24,000," so as to make the clause read:

Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak.: For current expenses, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 95, line 16, after the words "In all," to strike out the sum "$163,000" and insert "$164,000," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $164,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 14, to strike out:

Hereafter vacancies existing or vacancies occurring in the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall not be filled until the whole number of members of such board is reduced to five, and thereafter the number of members constituting said board shall not exceed five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, line 21, after the words "Volunteer Soldiers," to strike out the sum "$3,969,660" and insert "$4,012,160," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, $4,012,160.

Th amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under the Department of the Interior," subhead "Public buildings," on page 98, line 20, after the word "exceeding," to strike out the sum "$7,500" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

Repairs of buildings, Interior Department: For repairs of Interior Department and Pension Buildings, and of the old Post Office Department Building, occupied by the Interior Department, including preservation and repair of steam-heating and electric-lighting plants and elevators, $30,000, of which sum not exceeding $10,000 may be expended for day labor, except for work done by contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, after line 21, to insert:

Repairs and renewal of plumbing, and so forth, Pension Office Building: For repairing and renewing plumbing and rearranging toilet rooms in the Pension Office Building, and the construction of necessary sewer and connections therefor, $20,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we ought to strike out the words "and so forth." It seems that the words "Repairs and renewal of plumbing" are sufficient. The words "and so forth" might mean decorations of the building or anything else; there is no telling how the money might be expended.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I object to the suggestion of the Senator, except that in renewing the plumbing they may have to tear out the woodwork and would have to replace it, and, of course, that would involve painting.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said decorations. The word "repairs" would cover anything, I think, that is necessary—"repairs and renewal of plumbing."

Mr. WARREN. The words "general repairs" might be inserted instead of the words "and so forth."

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the words "and so forth" cover a great deal.

Mr. WARREN. I move, then, to strike out the words "and so forth" and to insert the words "and general repairs."

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in the committee amendment to strike out the words "and so forth," in line 2, and to insert after the word "plumbing" the words "and general repairs."

Mr. WARREN. My attention is called to the fact that the paragraph starts with the word "Repairs." Therefore I suggest that the paragraph ought to begin with the words "Renewal of plumbing and general repairs."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment as proposed to be modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the amendment to the amendment so as to read:

Renewal of plumbing and general repairs, Pension Office Building.

Mr. OVERMAN. Striking out the words "and so forth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Striking out the words "and so forth." The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 99, after line 2, to insert:

New roof, Pension Office Building: For the installation of a new roof and the replacing of skylights on the Pension Office Building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 5, to insert:

Improvement of electric-light plant for the Department of Interior buildings: For labor and material required in the construction of a concrete or brick tunnel or conduit to connect the Patent Office and the old Post Office Department Buildings under F Street NW., between Seventh and Eighth Streets, is hereby authorized, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 11, to insert:

Patent Office, interior court building: For excavation of the interior court of the Patent Office Building and the construction of a suitable building thereon for the use of the Patent Office, $220,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire does that refer to what we call the old Patent Office, the Interior Department?

Mr. WARREN. It does. There is a very large inside court there that is now perfectly useless except for light. It is proposed, first, to excavate down to the foundation of the building, which will allow for two stories before the light is interfered with at all, and then to draw the other lines up and erect a building in that area with a light shaft all around it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had in mind the proposition that we should change the name; that is, that we should speak of that building by its real name. It was once the Patent Office, but it is not connected with the Patent Office; it is the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but the Patent Office occupies the greater portion of the building, while the Interior Department occupies several other buildings. I think eventually the Interior Department will be somewhere else in a large building and this building will be occupied entirely by the Patent Office. So I think we should not change the name.

Mr. HEYBURN. I only made the suggestion. They have moved all of the old exhibits and files in connection with the Patent Office out of the building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 15, to insert:

Patent Office Building, repairs and improvement: For replacing defective windows and plumbing and for necessary painting and repairs incident to the work in the Patent Office Building, $50,000.

The amendment was greed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, after line 4, to insert:

For 22 marble pedestals for statuary in the Capitol Building, to replace the temporary wooden pedestals now in use, $3,725.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public lands service," on page 101, after line 6, to strike out "Salaries and commissions of registers: For salaries and commissions of registers of district land offices, at not exceeding $3,000 per annum each, $280,000," and insert:

Salaries and commissions of registers and receivers: For salaries and commissions of registers of district land offices and receivers of public money at district land offices, at not exceeding $3,000 per annum each, $560,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the item which that amendment replaces carries $280,000, so that there is an apparent increase there from $280,000 to $560,000.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that in the paragraph following other amounts are reduced accordingly, so that the total difference is finally only a trifle over $100,000; in fact, it would not be that when followed to its real application, because there would be required the detail from the general roll of an expensive clerk in place of each one of the receivers. If the Senator will allow me, he will find in what follows that there is a corresponding reduction.

Mr. REED. I was not quite through with my question. I notice in the language that is stricken out, which I read a day or two since, but have not had an opportunity to read just now, that the House endeavored to abolish certain offices; the office of receiver of public moneys for the land districts was to be abolished and the duties performed by a register. There are some other changes. I take it that the House made that proposition after due consideration with an idea toward the introduction of some economy. I am unwilling to vote for this amendment unless some reason is given for changing the plan of the House of Representatives; and I should like to know why their work is to be superseded in this way. Incidentally, while the Senator is on his feet, I want to know if this amendment does not work, or at least permit, a change in salary in some of the offices?

Mr. WARREN. It changes no officer's salary. The House provision does away with one officer and provides that his place may be taken by a clerk. Undoubtedly it would require two clerks in many of the offices, and in the mind of those who understand the management of the land offices the proposed change would not effect an economy.

I will say, with all due respect to the House of Representatives, that they had reasons for putting in the language. They did so because at one time there was a report from the department submitted along that line, and it is nothing against the Members of the other House to say that many of them are not from the public-land States, and so would not have personal knowledge on the subject. Where there are a register and receiver the purpose is that one may attend to what you might call the general paper work and the other to the finances, both to act as a court upon land matters, and either to act for both in case of the other's absence. The provision of the House bill would do away with the receiver and leave only one officer. A moment's reflection shows that you can hardly expect that it would be within human endurance for one man to be all day long, every day, always, except Sundays and holidays, on duty there. In doing away with the register, it is proposed to put a clerk, with a salary running from $1,500 up to $2,500, in his place. That means that in place of the receiver, who is, generally speaking, a lawyer, and usually acquainted with the lands in the State within which he works, there would be a civil-service clerk from Washington, who would know, of course, very little of the country and the conditions, and who could hardly be as well versed in the business as could the receiver. Another thing: This clerk would draw full salary, whether the business warranted it or not, whereas the register and receiver are paid according to the business of the office, $500 each per annum being the minimum and $3,000 each the maximum.

We have been rather industrious in Congress in the last year, I am glad to say, in trying to liberalize, in some respects, the land service, but in doing so we have doubled the duties of some of the officers and that will naturally somewhat increase the expense.

Provided the registers were made of cast iron and could every day during the long days be in service—and while it is only proposed to put one clerk in place of the receiver, they will have to provide a second clerk—and provided all were maximum offices, the greatest possible saving would not exceed $110,000. On the other hand, the probability is that it would take a second clerk, and the new arrangement would cost more than the original method of handling the work.

But aside from all that, the register and receiver, constituting a court, certainly ought to be preferable to one man as a court.

I do not believe this House proposition, Mr. President, has a single friend in the public-land States where there are large land offices. It would be, in my judgment, most unfortunate for the Government and more unfortunate for the homesteaders and settlers of the country to adopt the House provision. If you want to put a wall around the entire West and prevent its development, then enact the kind of legislation that is here proposed, but if you want to develop that country and have it in return fill the coffers of the older part of the country with what wealth they accumulate give each man a chance for his life and give these settlers an opportunity to go before a tribunal in which the Government may have confidence and in which the people themselves may have confidence.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. I notice that the amendment proposed by the committee provides for the payment of the registers and receivers by salary.

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken. The law now provides, and always has provided, that the stated salary of a receiver and that of a register is $500; but each has the privilege of earning, if the fees of a certain nature are sufficient, $3,000. If the Senator will examine it he will find that the receivers of public moneys are to receive not exceeding $3,000 per annum. That is the same old limit. This Senate amendment puts the law back as it is now, and as it is now those registers and receivers receive all the way from $500 to not exceeding $3,000.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had an opportunity to examine this matter, but I noticed that under the provision as it came from the House the registers and receivers were required to account for the fees received. Do they still have to account for those fees, except as indicated by the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly. All fees above $3,000 are turned in. It is a broad question whether, if this House provision should prevail, they could not demand $3,000, whether they earn $1,000 or $1,500, and, according to my analysis of it, we would not save any money; we would lose in the long run.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the question is not one of saving money. It is one of securing an adequate public service. The duties of the register and receiver are identical except as to the keeping of accounts. The most important duties performed by those officers are in connection with the determination of the rights of parties to the public lands upon which they file. The greater part of the time of those officers is devoted to hearing the testimony in regard to the right to enter land, whether as an ex parte proposition or in contests between two applicants for the land.

The receiver is invested with the duty of keeping the accounts, receiving the money, and accounting for it. That is comparatively a minor part of the duties. The register keeps, not the financial accounts, but the account of the proceedings in the land office. But whenever there is a contest they are alike invested with the power to hear the testimony and sit together as a court for the purpose of determining facts in dispute.

Now, sometimes, in the natural order of things, the register is better equipped to hear those controverted questions and determine them. In some cases it happens that the receiver is better equipped for the performance of that duty. But when they sit together they comprise a very good court, because it has for some years been the practice of the department to appoint lawyers to the position of register of the land office, and to-day I have personal knowledge of the fact that a number of registers of our land offices are attorneys at law, equipped to sit in any court of ordinary jurisdiction and determine intelligently controverted facts. I do not believe anyone would be appointed to-day who was not known to be competent to determine legal questions. There has been in a very few cases a waiver in the case of the receiver, because it was necessary to have a man of some financial ability and with a fair knowledge of accounts and accounting.

Now, it is proposed to substitute for the receiver of public moneys a bonded clerk. I do not know where the idea originated or why it originated. In the land offices in what we call the active part of the public-land States the fees exceed the maximum, and the work is far beyond the capacity of the register and receiver combined, and those of us from public-land States know that in a number of instances the department has, after thorough investigation, allowed extra clerks in addition to the register and receiver, for the performance of these duties.

Mr. WARREN. Every office is to have one now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to refer to this bill, but Senators may. There is, however, a demand coming up from all of the land offices in public-land States for additional clerical help to formulate and make effective the work of the register and receiver, sitting as they do sometimes for one or two weeks to hear contests over the right to enter public lands.

These are real trials. The Government does not now make adequate provision for the hearing and determination of these cases. It is inclined to select cheap quarters, upstairs rooms, in inaccessible places, because they can be obtained at a low rate of rental.

I wish to take this occasion to make a suggestion in that connection. Lands are applied for by old people as well as by young people, but when young persons apply for the entry of lands and contests arise their witnesses are more apt to be old people, and often decrepit people, than not. I have in mind a land office which has been maintained up very steep and difficult stairs for years. I have had my attention called to the fact that at some hearings it was not possible for witnesses, because of their age and crippled condition, to get up those stairs.

No response comes from the department when those matters are presented to it; no favorable attention is given to it. It ought to be written in the law that all land offices should be on the street or ground floor. These hardships may seem of small importance to people dealing with large questions and at a distance from the scene of action, but they are of very great importance.

Only recently I received a number of communications protesting against the location of a land office in which more than the maximum amount of business is transacted every year, because at some hearings it had been impossible to secure witnesses to attend in the room where the hearing was conducted because of their infirmity or age.

I merely call attention to this to show how little consideration is given to the party in interest. You might imagine from the propositions that come to us that these land offices were maintained for the sole and exclusive benefit of the land officers; and that is about the way they are, now. The question is not how can those who have enforced business at the land offices be served, but it is how is it possible to secure cheap men to secure cheap services, at a low compensation? It is high time we awakened up to it. The public lands and their disposal and the settlement of controversies affecting them constitute a large part of the Government's business.

Another evil has grown up. Congress provides that these controversies shall be settled by the court, consisting of the register and receiver of the land office. The executive department of the Government in its subordinate branches, if I may so term them, has undertaken to supplant the method provided by Congress by substituting what they call special agents to perform the duty of responsible officers—not bonded and responsible agents, but agents selected by no one knows whom; agents about whom no one knows anything; agents who are as inaccessible as the old Council of Ten; agents who sit in secret and act in secret and devious ways. They are sought to be substituted for responsible tribunals, in which Congress provides these cases shall be heard, and a special agent can to-day overrule a register and receiver without any difficulty; and when the contestant, whose interests are at stake, goes to the department and requests the privilege of inspecting or having knowledge of the facts upon which the special agent acted, he is refused, and he is refused without any explanation, except that the information they have, upon which they are going to act in determining his title, is purely for their own use and not available to the parties whose interests are being determined.

That is the position you will be confronted with if you will go to the Interior Department or any of its branches to-day and ask for a report upon a controversy involving the right to purchase lands of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The remarks of the Senator are very enlightening—to me at least. I should like to ask him how long this system which he has just described has been in vogue?

Mr. HEYBURN. It commenced to grow about the time an order was issued suspending all entries upon public lands.

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because at that time the system of special agents had become a real thing.

Mr. REED. About what time was that order issued? I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It was a department order, was it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. That order was issued about seven years ago.

Mr. REED. If that condition of affairs exists—and the Senator says it does, and I, of course, accept his statement without question; I know he would not make it unless he was thoroughly informed——

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, I have letters to back the statement.

Mr. REED. I do not question that at all. I wanted to ask the Senator what remedy he had to propose. Of course, from our side of the Chamber we would say that the whole department responsible for it ought to be removed from office, every man jack of them; but from his standpoint I want to ask what legislative remedy will meet it, and whether it can not be met by an amendment to this bill, because if it exists I want to help the Senator to remove it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the proposition now is to stop further leaks in justice. It is to prevent the extension of a bad system. I do not think it would be profitable to attempt to do it on the basis of criticizing a system that has been publicly in operation. I am merely citing these instances as an illustration of why we should not extend a bad system by cutting off one-half of a court now having jurisdiction.

The remedies that may be now or hereafter suggested must stand on their merits. I am speaking now against the proposed amendment to this bill, which attempts to further cripple the rights and the method of obtaining the rights of the settlers upon the public domain. It would be a long hour were we to enter upon the other field.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of the amendment. Does he refer to the amendment brought in by the committee or to the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to the amendment in the House bill. Let me make it plain, if the Senator has not from experience come in contact with it.

I have already stated the present system of a court that is constituted of the register and receiver of the land office, both of them familiar with the public-land laws and their administration. The House bill proposes to abolish one of the judges of that court, and to substitute for him a clerk, not with the judicial powers with which the receiver is invested, but with a sort of critical jurisdiction, with the function of criticizing the only remaining judge and harassing him. That is what it amounts to.

The House bill proposes to abolish the office of receiver of public moneys. In the public-land States where the reclamation projects are in vogue, and kindred systems of opening and developing the public lands, the receiver of public moneys performs a most useful function. He is indispensable to the carrying out of that class of public-land disposal. It is proposed to confer upon a clerk part of the duties now resting upon the receiver, and to force the remaining part of them upon the register, thus increasing the duties of an already overburdened official at the expense of efficiency and at the expense of accommodation to those who are entitled to access to these public-land offices.

It is not claimed that this is being done in the interest of the settler upon public lands. It is claimed that it is being done in the interest of the convenience of the law officers whose duty it is to administer the law according to the law. That is the difficulty. I assure the Senator from Missouri and all Senators that no argument can be made in favor of the abolition of this office having in mind the convenience, aye, the necessity, of those who go upon the public lands, honestly seeking for the right to obtain them which the law guarantees to them.

I sincerely hope no plea in the interest of economy will be interposed at the expense of the settlers upon the public domain and those having controversies before the Land Department.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a very lucid statement; but I fail to see how the House bill as reported would have the effect of continuing the system that the Senator so ably denounces, of Secret Service or special agents going out and doing this work, and then the department withholding from the parties in interest the information upon which they acted.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me there, perhaps I can make my reply more pointed. The House bill proposes to substitute a clerk, who will be a special agent, for the conservative receiver of the land office. It proposes to enlarge the spy system by substituting for the receiver of the land office—who, in nearly every case of which I have knowledge, is a man of ripe judgment and long years of experience—a clerk to be appointed under a system that is part of the system of which I have complained.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator to point out the language under which the House proposes to enlarge a spy system? I fail to get it. I am trying very hard to get it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will point out the language. It is on page 101, commencing with line 14. If the Senator will give this close attention, he will have no difficulty in seeing it:

The office of receiver of public moneys for land districts, from and after the 30th day of June, 1912, is abolished—

That is the responsible, conservative office. That is abolished—and all the powers, duties, obligations, and penalties at that time lawfully imposed upon such receivers and upon registers of land offices shall, from and after that date, be exercised by and imposed upon such registers—

That is putting an additional burden upon an already overburdened officer—

And such registers shall, in addition to the duties thus imposed, have charge of and attend to the sale of public and Indian lands within their respective districts, as provided by law—

That is an additional duty—

and official regulation, and shall be accountable under their official bonds for the proceeds of such sales—

That is the duty now resting on the receiver—and for all fees, commissions, and other moneys received by them under any provision of law or official regulation. Instead of the office of receiver of public moneys hereby and herein abolished—

Now we come to the new creation—

the Secretary of the Interior may appoint or designate a chief clerk for any land office, who shall receive such salary, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, payable from the appropriation for contingent expenses of land offices, as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may authorize.

There is a man of indefinite character and uncertain salary who is there at the mercy of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to be paid such compensation as the commissioner may think he is entitled to, and to be changed as often as the commissioner may choose to change him.

Mr. REED. Is not that the way the registers are appointed?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is putting a subordinate clerk of uncertain tenure in the place of a responsible judicial officer. You might just as well undertake to confer the jurisdiction of the judge on the bench upon the clerk of the court, and then make the clerk of the court subject to the conditions that are imposed in this provision.

Mr. REED. I understand that point that the Senator makes. But is not the clerk appointed by the same authority and in the same way that the register or receiver is appointed?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the register or receiver is appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. He is subject to the investigation of this body as to his fitness and qualifications. This clerk is appointed at the will of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is removable by him, and is subject only to the approval of that officer. He is also a thousand dollars a year cheaper man than the man whom we now have. We have a $3,000 man, and we can get pretty good men for $3,000. They must pass the scrutiny of the President of the United States and of the Senate of the United States before they enter upon their duties. This provision proposes to substitute for such a man an ordinary chief clerk.

The salary of the clerk is payable, not out of the Treasury of the United States, but out of the contingent expense account of the Land Office, as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may authorize.

And such chief clerk shall perform such duties as may be directed by the register of the land office for which he is appointed or by official regulations, including the receipt of moneys.

That is to say, he may be taken entirely from out the jurisdiction of the register, who is the responsible bonded head officer, and be placed under the sole jurisdiction of the Commissioner of the Land Office; and he may thereby become the spy, the antagonist, the critic of the head of the land office. They have put that reservation strictly upon this officer so that they can at any time antagonize him with the register of the land office.

He shall, during the absence of such register, or in case of a vacancy in the office of such register, exercise all the powers, perform all the duties, and be subject to all the obligations and penalties imposed upon such register by law or official regulation.

The register now is governed by law in regard to the disposition of public lands. But this amendment in the House bill provides that he may be governed by the regulations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The special agents now pay no attention to the law. They are governed by the regulations of the land office, which in many cases are constituted of mere instructions, "Go and do this," or "Go and do that."

A little further: In case of the absence of the register of the land office this $2,000 clerk may be substituted to perform the duties of the register, which may be the conduct of a hearing involving millions of dollars' worth of property. These officers do not deal entirely with small questions or small values. They deal with questions involving intricate principles of law and millions of dollars of value or investment. And yet it is proposed to transfer the jurisdiction to hear and determine that kind of controversy to a clerk of the register of the land office merely to make a showing that something has been saved.

Now, I am not speaking for something new; I am speaking in favor of the old-established custom and law that has been in force not only through Republican administrations, but has been in force for a lifetime through both Republican and Democratic administrations. The proposition in the bill as passed by the House is absolutely new and untried. This is not a time to indulge in such experiments.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire just a moment to finish reading that portion of the bill which relates to this subject:

But such clerk shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, execute to the United States a bond in such penal sum as the said Secretary may prescribe, with approved security, for the faithful performance of his official duties; and such clerk shall be accountable under his official bond for such proceeds arising from the sale of public or Indian lands within his district, and for such fees, commissions, and other moneys as may come into his hands under any law or official regulation or direction.

Then it provides:

Provided, That all the fees and commissions now allowed by law to both such registers and such receivers shall, after the 30th day of June, 1912, be paid to and accounted for by such registers, in the manner prescribed by law and departmental regulations, and in like amounts in which they are now required to be paid to and accounted for by such receivers, but the compensation of such registers shall in no case exceed $3,000 per annum, as now provided by law.

That is the substitute that they propose for existing law, under which these courts were organized more than 40 years ago, and under which the law has been administered until the interference that I have suggested through the special agents, and under which it should be exercised and administered to-day.

I am not going to defend any existing condition because it originated in one administration or another, but the evil that exists would be emphasized by the adoption of this provision. Conditions that are bad enough now would be made worse by it. Instead of having the benefit of the conservative judgment of two trained men, and they are trained men as a rule, in dealing with land laws, instead of having the benefit of that kind of a court, we would have one man authorized to administer the law subject to rules and regulations, and the interference of a clerk.

We have in our land office now a register and receiver and a clerk, all rendered necessary because of the volume of business that is transacted there.

I sincerely hope, unless the Senator has given this matter the attention that I know he would give to a public question upon which he was called upon to act responsibly, that he will not urge anything against this much of a redemption against existing evils.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I am very greatly obliged to the Senator for his very clear explanation of present conditions. I would almost be inclined to believe that some one of the Members of the present administration or some former administration interested in the perpetuation of the spy system and increasing it had drawn this House proposition. I am sure it was not the intention of the House——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the House provision is based upon a recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. REED. I was about to come to that. I was in the act of saying that I took it that if this House provision does in any way tend to perpetuate a spy system, it must have been put in by the House upon the recommendation of some department chief.

However, the matter is now I think quite plain, and I am content. I only want to beg the Senator, who has given this matter great attention, to bring in a bill at the proper time which shall abolish this iniquitous spy system which he states was inaugurated some six years ago and has been perpetuated. I think it ought to be wiped out, and I think his knowledge of the question is such that it will enable him to bring in the kind of a measure that ought to be passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the question of economy involved in this amendment has been rather minimized, as I understand it, by the Senator from Idaho, but nevertheless I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that this provision of the bill is based upon the recommendation, as I said a moment ago, of the Department of the Interior, after very careful consideration, and upon which they believe that there will be a reduction of the expenditures of the Government without detriment to the public service.

The Senate committee amendment which I voted against in committee and to which I am still opposed, on page 101, seeks to increase the appropriation by $280,000.

The Senator from Wyoming called attention to the fact in that connection that subsequently there was a reduction made, which is true, and it appears at page 103 of the bill, the reduction being from $490,000, as carried by the House, to $410,000, as provided by the Senate committee, making there a reduction of $80,000, which, subtracted from $280,000 on the succeeding page, will show the net saving to the Treasury as provided by the House measure; and that, too, Mr. President, when the House concedes, under the recommendation of the Secretary, with whom I am not personally acquainted, but who is represented to be a man of ability and integrity, that this amount can be saved to the Government without detriment to the public service.

I thought that much ought to be injected into this debate just here in the interest and in defense of the House proposition.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken about that being the amount and the only amount, because the shortest way to get at that is this: They seek to do away with 93 receivers, at $3,000 each, and put 93 clerks in.

Mr. CULBERSON. At $2,000.

Mr. WARREN. At $2,000 each, which at best is only $93,000, but at present the registers are not all receiving $3,000 per annum or $2,000 or possibly $1,000, because their pay is based upon fees.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am only speaking with reference to the two pages, not to the actual expenditure. The Senate, on page 102, increases the appropriation by $280,000, and on page 103 reduces the House appropriation by $80,000, leaving a substantial increase on the part of the Senate over the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. WARREN. But in the language of the amendment they provide for these clerks, taking it out of another fund. They are to be taken from Washington and sent out there. So the amount is not as it seems in dollars and cents.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL Possibly, as the State of Texas owns all of her public lands herself and has nothing to do with the public lands of the United States except as situated in the other States of the Union, the Senator from Texas does not understand or has not had his attention called to the fact that this is not money which you are saving to the taxpayers of the United States. You are not collecting this revenue or paying these salaries from the general revenues of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand. It is being paid out of the money received from the sale of public lands.

Mr. FALL. Not at all.

Mr. WARREN. It is paid from fees for the work the men do.

Mr. FALL. It is being paid out of the money paid by every homestead applicant, every desert-land applicant, who makes an application or a final proof for a piece of land on the public domain. It is not paid by the taxpayers at all, but it is paid in fees now.

Mr. WARREN. By the labor of the register and receiver.

Mr. FALL. Certainly. There is very much more paid into the Treasury than is paid out, and unless the amount is paid in by those people making these applications not one cent is paid out. The registers and receivers, in other words, do not draw $3,000 a year flat salary, but, as has been explained by the chairman of the committee and others, they only draw a proportion of it, and can draw no more. If they collect $10,000 in fees the balance is covered into the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose they did not collect $3,000, would that be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. FALL. The minimum salary is $500. The United States obligates itself to pay to each one of these officers $500 per annum.

Mr. OVERMAN. And all these fees go back into the Treasury?

Mr. FALL. They go back into the Treasury to hold the money there. If you are going to discharge one of these officials, which I would not agree to do, for the reasons I will give to the Senate, then return the money to the people who pay in these fees. Reduce the fees by one-half for applications and final proof in the entry of land, and then you will be doing somebody some good.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would not that be better?

Mr. FALL. It would be except for one reason, and that is we do not want land-contest cases decided by one official in the respective land districts, and coming here be decided by one official of the United States Government who knows nothing about it. As long as we can try our contest cases before two, we at least have a double opportunity to get justice. We do not want to leave these contest cases to any one man.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am not specially familiar with the land system of the United States. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that these bonds are conditioned upon the faithful accounting of proceeds arising from the sale of the public or Indian lands of the district.

Mr. FALL. Those are extraordinary cases where a sale of such public land is ordered directly. I think I can safely say to the Senator that there has been no such sale of land made within the State of New Mexico, formerly the Territory of New Mexico, in 27 or 28 years, to my knowledge. These fees are entirely fees collected from the applicants, the settlers, the homesteaders, and the entrymen on the public domain.

Mr. CULBERSON. Those fees belong to the Government of the United States, and go into the Treasury of the United States as a common fund.

Mr. FALL. They are collected by the register and receiver, respectively, under a schedule providing that the register's fees for an application shall be so much and the receiver's fees shall be so much. Then, as the Senator says, they are covered into the Treasury of the United States. Out of those fees so collected the respective officers may have in salary as much as $3,000 per year, not more.

Mr. CULBERSON. The salaries of these registers and receivers are paid——

Mr. FALL. Not by the State of Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. No; not by the State of Texas, but they are paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. No; they are taken out only as the money comes in. They do not go into the United States Treasury.

Mr. FALL. Only the excess goes into the United States Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. The excess over $3,000 goes into the Treasury; it is taken by the officer as receiver and accounted for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I was out when this question came up. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the close of line 13, page 101.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 13, after the numerals and before the period, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That on or after July 1, 1913, the President is hereby authorized, by Executive order, to cover into the classified service all registers and receivers, and whenever he shall act under the authority hereby given the advice and consent of the Senate shall be unnecessary to the appointment of such registers and receivers, and the salaries of such officials may be fixed by the President at not more than $3,000 per annum.

Mr. WARREN. I make a point of order against the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On what ground does the Senator make his point of order?

Mr. WARREN. That it is general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES. This whole subject is general legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all, as we make it in the bill; it is an appropriation.

Mr. JONES. What is offered as a substitute for lines 7, 8, and 9 and lines 14, 15, and 16, and so forth, is all legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. What is offered by the Senate committee is to maintain the law as it now exists. The House provision proposes to change the law, and the Senate committee has recommended that it be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, after line 13, to strike out:

The office of receiver of public moneys for land districts, from and after the 30th day of June, 1912, is abolished, and all the powers, duties, obligations, and penalties at that time lawfully imposed upon such receivers and upon registers of land offices shall, from and after that date, be exercised by and imposed upon such registers; and such registers shall, in addition to the duties thus imposed, have charge of and attend to the sale of public and Indian lands within their respective districts, as provided by law and official regulation, and shall be accountable under their official bonds for the proceeds of such sales, and for all fees, commissions, and other moneys received by them under any provision of law or official regulation. Instead of the office of receiver of public moneys hereby and herein abolished, the Secretary of the Interior may appoint or designate a chief clerk for any land office, who shall receive such salary, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, payable from the appropriation for contingent expenses of land offices, as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may authorize, and such chief clerk shall perform such duties as may be directed by the register of the land office for which he is appointed, or by official regulations, including the receipt of moneys, and he shall, during the absence of such register, or in case of a vacancy in the office of such register, exercise all the powers, perform all the duties, and be subject to all the obligations and penalties imposed upon such register by law or official regulation; but such clerk shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, execute to the United States a bond in such penal sum as the said Secretary may prescribe, with approved security, for the faithful performance of his official duties; and such clerk shall be accountable under his official bond for such proceeds arising from the sale of public or Indian lands within his district, and for such fees, commissions, and other moneys as may come into his hands under any law or official regulation or direction: Provided, That all the fees and commissions now allowed by law to both such registers and such receivers shall, after the 30th day of June, 1912, be paid to and accounted for by such registers, in the manner prescribed by law and departmental regulations, and in like amounts in which they are now required to be paid to and accounted for by such receivers, but the compensation of such registers shall in no case exceed $3,000 per annum, as now provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 11, after the word "typewriters," to strike out the sum "$490,000" and insert "$410,000," so as to read:

Contingent expenses of land offices: For clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses of the district land offices, including the exchange of typewriters, $410,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, after line 23, to insert:

To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to temporarily employ additional clerks as follows: Twelve clerks, at $1,200 each; 12 clerks, at $1,000 each; 12 copyists, at $900 each; in all, $37,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 104, line 18, after the words "General Land Office," to strike out "instead of $250,000 made available for that purpose for the fiscal year 1912," and insert "and not exceeding $25,000 additional for expenses of hearings held by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law," so as to read:

Depredations on public timber, protecting public lands, and settlement of claims for swamp land and swamp-land indemnity: To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; of protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, and of adjusting claims for swamp lands, and indemnity for swamp lands, including not exceeding $25,000 for clerical services in bringing up and making current the work of the General Land Office, and not exceeding $25,000 additional for expenses of hearings held by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries are of that character or have been made in compliance with law, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 105, after line 6, to insert:

Purchase of motor boat, Alaska: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to purchase a motor boat for use in the District of Alaska in the investigation of unlawful cutting of timber from the public lands, the inspection of timber cut under permit, and the examination of alleged illegal entries, to be immediately available, $5,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I do not claim to know much about Alaska, but I do know, from some 30 years' experience, something about the frontier of the United States. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee as to the necessity of any appropriation to investigate the unlawful cutting of timber in Alaska and the inspection of timber cut under a permit. I do not know of any market open to the sale of timber in Alaska to which those isolated people themselves are not entitled, and certainly the few people in that enormous territory should at least be free from the inspection of the Interior Department.

As the people of Arizona are under that inspection, I feel some sympathy for the people of Alaska. I can not understand why there was any necessity in a sparsely settled country like Alaska for the Interior Department to prohibit the cutting of timber for domestic purposes. Although it may be possible that it would be necessary to prevent their sending timber to some other country, certainly it would not be necessary to do so as to the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Just a word, and I will conclude. For instance, take my Territory, or State, rather. I have fallen in the habit of calling it a "Territory," because we have lived under a Territorial government for many years. There we have timber in many places within easy reach. I believe I am within the truth when I say that, while we stand in the presence of growing timber, ripe timber, and rotting timber, the timber we use comes largely from Seattle, or at least from the extreme northwest part of the United States, burdened with the great freight rates from there. So, in the case of Alaska, with only a few people compared with its enormous extent, to appropriate $5,000 for a motor boat to enable a Government officer to see that some man is not cutting timber to build a fire or build a bridge across a creek, except under the supervision of the Interior Department, appears to me to be absurd. I believe that the people of Alaska ought to be left free for 20 years, at least, to work out their destiny without the intervention of a lot of spies and policemen.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the timber to which reference is made in the bill is cut for mining purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, they ought to get it free.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, of course, a question of policy, and it has been decided otherwise; but I suppose if it were given free to the great mining companies up there we would find in the public press all over the United States a hue and cry that the Guggenheims were destroying the timber of Alaska for mining purposes. If a man in Alaska wants to build a home timber is given to him under free permit. No citizen in Alaska who desires to use it for his own purposes is ever refused a free permit for cutting timber.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How far does he have to go to get it?

Mr. SMOOT. To the nearest place where it is possible to cut it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How far is that from the man who gives the permit? That is the point I make.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, Mr. President, that the forest reserves in Alaska are divided into districts, and a man would go to the supervisor of that particular district in which he lives to get a permit.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, Mr. President, as I understand, this amendment does not refer to forest-reserve timber; it refers to timber on the public lands; otherwise it would not be under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, or any other Senator who knows, even if we concede for the sake of the argument, which I do not concede, that these investigations ought to be had, can anybody tell me the necessity of this particular expenditure? If, as the Senator from Utah says, it is to guard the cutting of timber by the great mining companies, certainly this motor boat would not be necessary for that purpose, because the places where those companies are located are easily accessible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in some periods of the year perhaps they are accessible, while in other seasons they are not; but as I understand a motor boat is almost necessary there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why?

Mr. SMOOT. In order to reach the different districts in which the timber is cut.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. To reach what particular districts?

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever the timber may be cut.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Where is it cut? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. SMOOT. In different parts of Alaska.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to find out whether there is any reason for this item making an appropriation for a motor boat. I am asking for information.

Mr. SMOOT. The boat, of course, would be used along the inland watercourses, and I think the testimony given before the committee states specifically the necessity for it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the information I want.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, replying to my colleague, I desire to say that the Commissioner of the General Land Office was before the committee. As I recall, he stated that this was to facilitate transportation and avoid delays. If the officers of the department are to travel over the country, their business would be greatly expedited by having motor boats along the coast, where, as the Senator knows, there are many inlets, rivers, bays, and so forth. It is only a matter of $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know it is a matter of only $5,000, but the appropriations for this particular purpose are increasing year by year. We have increased the appropriation in regard to timber depredations, and it seems to me that, with the great sums we appropriate for this general purpose, every time a specific object is sought to be attained we ought not to appropriate particularly for that. It is only $5,000, but if they need a motor boat I suppose they are authorized to purchase it under the general appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. That is the trouble. They are not authorized to do so. I care nothing about the matter, but on the ground of necessity, if they are to travel, a boat is the cheapest and best way of getting from place to place, and under the rulings of the auditors they would not be able to buy a motor boat under any appropriation they already have.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the testimony before the committee. Mr. Dennett, Commissioner of the General Land Office, stated:

> As you know, in Alaska the timber on the public domain can be sold, somewhat under the same conditions under which it is sold in forest reservations. They can not do that in the public domain in the United States. Our agents have to travel about a great deal, and there is a great necessity for the purchase of that boat. We have two agents in Alaska. The transportation facilities there are very poor, not so much in themselves as in the delays, as it is necessary sometimes for a man to wait a week until a boat comes. We asked the House for $5,000 to purchase a launch for use in that service.
> Senator PERKINS. Those delays might be obviated. Where do you keep the boat?
> Mr. DENNETT. On the Yukon and on the Tanana, where we have to go.
>
> Senator PERKINS. They run steamers on the coast, you know.
> Mr. DENNETT. Yes; this is for use inland. I am told by Mr. Sheridan that there is about 4,000 miles of river that we can traverse by means of a boat like this.
> Senator PERKINS. I was in the Alaska trade for 30 years, so that I know all about it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, it appears that there are four or five thousand miles that this one boat would be expected to travel to reach places where it is needed; but we all know that during the season of navigation on the Yukon the boats are frequent and make regular trips, and, so far as weeks intervening between a trip is concerned, you could not get this boat from one end of that river to the other in a week or two weeks; but——

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that they would make a trip of that extent at one time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose it would be a little more comfortable for the special agent to travel in a $5,000 yacht than it would be to take the regular boats.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I simply wish to inquire of the Senator from Utah if he knows how the investigations with reference to the unlawful cutting of timber are carried on now?

Mr. SMOOT. Timber is sold in Alaska at so much per thousand stumpage. As I understand, in the past there has been great delay in cases where applications have been made for the purchase of timber, and this is to hasten the examination and cut down expenses, as the department says, in connection with the sale of timber.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it is quite plain from this discussion that there is a great necessity for this boat. I think the Commissioner of the General Land Office needs this boat, not for the purpose of protecting timber but for other purposes. It is about on a par with some of the automobiles and carriages being operated at Washington for Government use, but which at the same time are used principally for the pleasure of the people who happen to hold the offices to which such carriage or vehicle is assigned.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator that I do not believe the Commissioner of the General Land Office ever was in Alaska, and I do not know that he ever will go to Alaska.

Mr. REED. I did not mean the commissioner himself, but whoever it is up there working under him, who needs this boat.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri and I could possibly agree on the matter if the provision should read that this boat shall not be used in the investigation of the unlawful cutting of timber in that country or for any other purpose mentioned in the section. Then they might get the boat and use it as they pleased, but I do not want it used as a means of following a man who has a permit down the river or up the river 400 miles to see whether he has actually performed what the permit requires.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think we had better give them an extra appropriation for skates for use on the river in the wintertime?

Mr. REED. It occurred to me that some means of getting around over the ice would be quite as appropriate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. An ice boat would do.

Mr. REED. But, talking about this matter seriously, just for a moment, it is true that in every department of the Government, State, National, and municipal, the first thing a man wants is a position; the next thing he wants is an increase of salary; and the next thing he wants is a vehicle furnished by the public to ride about in. This is only $5,000, and we hear the expression, "it is only $5,000," or "it is only a hundred thousand dollars," or "it is only a quarter of a million dollars," when we are discussing these questions, as though we were only speaking about a peck of potatoes or something of inconsequential value.

I am in hearty accord with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I think we are spending a great deal more money in keeping citizens of the United States from using a little firewood than all the firewood they would consume is worth. With a vast domain such as we have in Alaska, the rigors of the climate, the inaccessibility of the Territory, the hardships which must be borne by those who go there, when it comes to such a matter as a little timber that a man may desire for his home, or for fuel, I feel inclined to let him have it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And without a permit.

Mr. REED. Without a permit; and without any red tape or anything of that kind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. Just one word to finish the sentence, and then I will yield.

I have been informed that in the State of Arizona, for instance, nearly all the timber in that State has been set aside in Government reservations; and there it grows and dies and rots, and people are obliged to import their lumber from distant points and pay exorbitant prices for it; and all this in the name of conservation. In my opinion, the best way to conserve the resources of America is to turn the native resources of this country over to American citizens to build homes upon. I would rather have one good farm with a farmhouse on it, and a farmer and his wife and family of children, than I would to have 10,000 acres of land going to waste. I think there has been a great deal of nonsense about this matter of conservation. When it comes to buying fast motor boats for somebody merely to ride around through the waters of Alaska to see whether some poor fellow has cut down a tree to build a fire or to help build a home, I think we are going to the limit of absurdity. I say, again, I think somebody wants a boat to ride in more than he wants a boat to capture timber thieves.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield for a question, or I yield the floor, either.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not want to take the floor from the Senator from Missouri. I do not know why the Senator from Missouri seems to assume that the purpose of this motor boat is to enable the officers of the General Land Office to catch some poor fellow who is cutting timber with which to build a fire. I do not apprehend there will be any serious objection, or any objection at all, to a man doing that.

Furthermore, I am not sure that I understood the Senator correctly, but I understood him to say that he agreed entirely with the Senator from Arizona when he said that he would advocate a policy of turning over all the resources of the country to be taken by anybody who wanted to come along and take them. Did the Senator say that?

Mr. REED. No. If I made any statement so broad as that, I did not intend to do so. I think the Senator from Washington misapprehended me. I was talking about individuals who might help themselves to a little of the growing timber. I was not talking about mining companies going in and taking the natural resources of the country that are in the mines and veins of the earth.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, there is another question that is pertinent to that. In carrying out his policy of encouraging the building of homes and the opening of the public lands for homestead, I ask the Senator if he thinks that policy would be furthered in any way by allowing steamboat companies, for instance, operating lines of steamers on the Yukon River, which are compelled to use wood as fuel, to denude the public lands of timber?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And to leave them so denuded for some homesteader to settle on after the timber has been cut off? The great mining companies use a great deal of the wood of that country. Some are very large and very wealthy companies and use a vast amount of wood in thawing out the ground in which the mining operations are carried on. I ask the Senator if he would throw open the public timber in that vicinity free to those people; and, if not, how is that going to be prevented and regulated unless some United States official is there to see that the law is enforced?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, all of those interrogatories are entirely outside of any policy which I advocate or anything I have said. I have been talking about actual settlers and individuals. The question has already been asked here very pointedly where this boat could be used and where the timber was which was to be protected, and nobody was able to answer. I am not in favor of allowing mining companies to go in and seize the mineral deposits of those Territories, or of allowing them to slaughter our forests; I am talking about the system of espionage that follows every individual as he goes through the Territory and requires him to go perhaps hundreds of miles to get a permit. I am talking about the lack of any necessity for this motor boat; and there has been no necessity for it shown. I take it that the large mining companies of which the Senator speaks are operating at well-known places, and that there is no necessity of any motor boat to reach them, but that a Government inspector is now in the vicinity and properly should be.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I think, in fairness, that I should say that possibly the Senator from Missouri did not hear a portion at least of the evidence taken before the committee which was read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as to the necessity for this boat. I can not say that I am very thoroughly impressed with the necessity of buying a motor boat; I think, possibly, in view of the fact that the Alaskan waters are very often closed by ice, to buy a flying machine might be more appropriate; but nevertheless, in fairness to the commissioner who asks this appropriation, I think possibly it might be well enough at this point to call the attention of the Senator to his statement as to the purpose for which it is needed. He says:

> The work in Alaska is increasing. As you know, in Alaska the timber on the public domain can be sold, somewhat under the same conditions under which it is sold in forest reservations.

That is, by law now existing.

> They can not do that in the public domain in the United States. Our agents have to travel about a great deal, and there is a great necessity for the purchase of that boat. We have two agents in Alaska. The transportation facilities there are very poor, not so much in themselves as in the delays, as it is necessary sometimes for a man to wait a week until a boat comes in.

One of the passenger boats, I presume.

> We asked the House for $5,000 to purchase a launch for use in that service.

Then he goes on to say in answer to a question by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]:

> Where do you keep the boat?
> Mr. DENNETT. On the Yukon and on the Tanana, where we have to go.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, continually during this discussion reference has been made to the miners' use of timber as though the miner was a vandal. Where there is one mining company there are hundreds of miners. The mining company is the least difficult to control of all those who go into a country. The mining company does not come along until after hundreds of miners have gone down in despair because of their failure, after an honest effort, to find a mine or to make one.

The first thing a miner who goes into the country does is to provide himself with a shovel, and then with wood for fuel and cooking purposes. Then he goes to work with a pick and shovel, with a little bit of charcoal to make fire—so as to sharpen tools.

Then he goes to work with pick and shovel, and it is weeks or months or years before he has any occasion to use timber. If he is placer mining he never has occasion to use it, except for fuel and building purposes or for flumes or sluice boxes. He will hew out the sluice boxes by hand or he will whipsaw them; and if anyone ever saw two men whipsawing lumber out of the log he will not try to take anything away from them.

Then, if he has a lode claim or ledge, he will start perhaps to sink on it, and he must have timber to timber his shaft as he goes down to keep it from falling in on him. If he is developing his claim by a tunnel he must make timbers, hew them out by hand, and put them in the mine to keep the shaft from caving in on him. That goes on for months and years and years, and the man or two men together work there under those circumstances.

The idea of the Government charging them for timber for those purposes is too barbarous to consider. All that a man would use would not pay the salary of one of these rangers for a month, and yet he is to be there subject to be pounced upon; and not only that, but perhaps to be taken hundreds of miles to be tried before some commissioner because he was making the necessary use of timber immediately around him on this small scale. Those are the men whom it is proposed to run down with this motor boat.

Around the mouth of the Yukon River, the delta of the Yukon River—and that is spoken of as being one of the fields in which to use this boat—there is a bird reserve. Mark that, Senators. There is a bird reserve in Alaska covering all of the delta of the Yukon River, twice as large as some of the States. If a man wanted to go on to the Yukon River in this boat, he must go through this bird reserve. Whoever heard of any part of the Government being authorized to create or to maintain a bird reserve! And yet we are at a large expense in maintaining and protecting, I suppose, with this boat, a bird reserve in Alaska, covering the mouth of the Yukon River—an area, I repeat, as big as a State. Go and look at the map of the United States in the cloakroom and you will find it there on that map as one of the reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Are they any particular kind of birds, if the Senator will permit me an interruption?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Canary birds.

Mr. HEYBURN. Canary birds, I suppose. That is suggested to me by my friend on my right. Birds of rare plumage, that are supposed to ride on this boat. These men would probably go up there and luxuriate, drifting around, admiring the birds, eating the ducks that are ripe—all on this motor boat. That motor boat therefore would probably take up a permanent station about the mouth of the Yukon River, in the bird reserve, and remain there all the year round. The agents would not hear of some man 700 miles up above, along toward Circle City and that country, actually mining and using a little wood to keep himself warm and to prevent the earth around him from caving in on his mine.

There are operating on the Yukon River no large mining companies that are using any timber of the United States. I only wish there were. Instead of putting up signs warning people out of Alaska, why do they not give them a bounty, a bonus, for coming there? The Government of the United States could afford to give them free transportation and free sustenance and free maintenance in Alaska in order to get somebody to go there.

We are now putting up warning signs instead of beckoning to the people to come and making it possible for them to come. We are sending a motor boat up there among those poor, distressed, poverty-stricken, struggling American citizens for somebody to ride around with a little gilt cord around his cap to boss them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely want to call the Senate's attention to the fact that there are steamers of all sizes going up the Yukon River. There has been in the past quite a business of men cutting timber and selling to these boats. That is going on to-day all the time, and I think the motor boat will be used for that rather than to lie around any bird reserve at the mouth of the Yukon River.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How are they going to use the boat for transportation? The agents will not let them get the coal.

Mr. SMOOT. They are steamers that do not belong to the United States. They are tramp steamers. People come in there from all over the country, and I think if they are going to use American timber they ought to pay at least the stumpage price for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator pardon me? I just want to mention an actual occurrence.

Some years ago the boats on the Coeur d'Alene River cut their fuel on the banks of the river; that is, it was cut by other persons and sold to them. So some one told the Government it was losing money. They were building up a civilization that has brought into that country a great many million dollars, but the Government did not take that into consideration.

They said, "Here is a man who is apparently prospering, and let us stop him." So they sent an agent out there, and he said to the steamboat company, "Where are you getting the wood that you use in your boilers?" The reply was, "We are buying it from men who cut it on the river." Then they were asked, "Well, you have been cutting timber on this mountain side?" "Yes; that is, the man we buy it from has been cutting it there." Then the agent asked, "Why do you not use the dead timber?" and the reply was, "There is no dead timber around here."

The agent looked around upon the hillside, and viewed a tamarack which he called a larch, and he said, "Why do you not cut that timber up there?" One of the men said, "If you will give us a written order permitting us to use that timber, we will give you no more trouble." That agent gave them an order that that tamarack might be cut—it was in winter, when the leaves were off—and they cut down the finest, sound, growing tamarack timber that there was in that whole country. That is about the grade of intelligence we meet in dealing with this question and in dealing with these agents.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. He has stated that there are so many boats plying up and down that stream that they are denuding the banks of timber. If there are so many boats going up there to get the timber and using it for fuel and the whole forest is being consumed, it seems to me it is wholly unnecessary for the Government to buy a boat. There are plenty of boats there already.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the boat is not purchased for the purpose of hunting a market for the Alaskan timber. The boat is purchased for the purpose of protecting the timber that is there, so that whenever it is used the Government will get the benefit of it.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is, Mr. President, the Government issues permits to cut timber, and the agent, after issuing the permit, wants the boat and needs the boat to follow the person to whom the permit has been granted. It has been suggested here that the Government loses four or five days' time because of the irregularity of these other boats. As I undertand, this would be a device by which the agent could start at once, and a man with a permit could not get out of sight.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it is only a theory that the Senator is advancing. It never works out in practice the way the Senator has put it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment——

Mr. WARREN. I will first perfect the amendment. I move to strike out, in line 12, the words "to be immediately available."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "to be immediately available."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we could not hear the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. It was to strike out the words "to be immediately available." That has become unnecessary now that it is after the 1st of July.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that, of course, as the Senator knows, brings us to a point where I will be obliged to ask that the bill be laid aside for the present. I give notice that I shall ask to take it up to-morrow immediately after the morning business.

Mr. REED. I did not ask for the yeas and nays for that reason. I think there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming propose to lay the bill aside?

Mr. WARREN. I supposed the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was going on this afternoon, but I now understand he is not. If not, we might lay aside the amendment that has just been under discussion and proceed with the rest of the bill.

Mr. REED. I was going to suggest that course. I did not intend to obstruct the consideration of the bill. I merely wanted a vote on this matter. If the Senator is content to lay it aside, that course is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that it may be laid aside and that we may proceed with the consideration of the other amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session since 11 o'clock, and it is now practically 5 o'clock. It seems to me we ought to adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think we can shorten up the speeches to-morrow enough to make up for the time we may lose to-night?

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that it is time to adjourn, as we have been in session for six hours.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on that statement, understanding that the Senator is going to assist me in vigorous work to-morow to finish the bill—for it will be Saturday, and I should very much like to finish it—I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks on the Panama Canal bill. I desire to give this notice now, instead of going on with my speech this afternoon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 20, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 19, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless His holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits." It is He that hath made us and not we ourselves; we are His people and the sheep of His pasture. Without Him we can do nothing; with Him we may accomplish all things. Fill our hearts with brotherly love that we may enter into the work of this day with malice toward none and charity for all, doing whatsoever our hands findeth to do with might, leaving the results with Thee. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized.

TRANSPORTATION OF PRIZE-FIGHT PICTURES.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call from the Speaker's table the bill S. 7027, an act to prohibit the interstate transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce having reported a similar bill, I am authorized by that committee to make this motion. I ask that it be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 7027) to prohibit the interstate transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, from one State or Territory or the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or to bring or to cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to take or receive from the mails, or any express company or other common carrier, with intent to sell, distribute, circulate, or exhibit any matter or thing herein forbidden to be deposited for mailing, delivery, or carriage in interstate commerce.

SEC. 3. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall for each offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has never been considered in the House at all. I think it is due to the House to know what it provides for.

Mr. SIMS. I am perfectly willing to explain it.

Mr. MANN. Are you going to have any amendments to it?

Mr. SIMS. No; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. But it is subject to amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this bill in all respects is similar to one that has been reported in the House, with the exception of the punishment provided, and which was introduced by the gentleman from Georgia and reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and is now on the calendar. The House bill was introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY]; and as he is thoroughly familiar with the bill on the same subject, and the Senate bill being identical with it, I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] such time as he may want in which to explain the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] is recognized for such time as he desires, not exceeding an hour.

Mr. SIMS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I was not giving attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], but I gather at this moment that the bill S. 7027 is up for consideration. It is a Senate bill, the House having reported a similar bill from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which bill, in its material points, was introduced by me some time ago. This legislation is similar to Federal legislation covering kindred questions. I presume the House is thoroughly familiar with the purpose and object of the bill. It is to prevent the transportation in interstate commerce of films and pictorial representations of prize fights—the type of fights which have been outlawed by nearly all the States of the Union, as lotteries had been outlawed by the several States before like Federal legislation was enacted touching the transportation through interstate commerce of tickets, lottery advertisements, and other gambling schemes.

I will state that the bill, with the slightest deviation, follows existing legislation now on the statutes touching interstate transportation and transmission, both through these channels and the Post Office Department, of such matter as is demoralizing and objectionable.

This bill does not go so far as to prevent newspaper accounts and reports of these contests, however much some Members might be disposed to let it go that far. Now, to illustrate, the situation, which may not have been brought to the attention of some Members, is that when the Congress exercised supervision over the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico it prevented these contests under their Territorial government, but they now having been admitted to the Union there is no statute in the State of New Mexico restrictive or prohibitive of these brutal combats, nowithstanding the fact that the other States have prohibited them. It is therefore within the power of one of our States to permit these inhuman and uncivilized contests, and, consequent thereon, that they be disseminated in moving-picture shows and other exhibitions throughout the entire country.

One word further: There is one question that gentlemen might raise, and that is that the authorities in the several States, counties, and municipalities can, by prohibitive legislation, prevent the display of these pictures and thus the result be accomplished. Theoretically that is true. But the same would be true of the transmission in the mails and the carriage in commerce of lottery tickets, of gold-brick schemes, of devices for the prevention of conception, and other things that Congress has taken cognizance of under its postal and commerce powers. And so the House in passing the Senate bill does nothing in this regard than to apply similar legislation to the transportation of prize-fight films, prize-fight pictures, and these contests, as has been applied to other objectionable institutions and items that otherwise could be transmitted by express, by mail, and through other means of commerce.

I would be glad to yield to a Member for any question on the measure, but this is all I desire to submit.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the terms of this bill would there be any difficulty in persons manufacturing films sending a man along the route and leaving them at such places as were desired? Films are not bulky.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will state to the gentleman that there is nothing in this bill that covers the point made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Ought it not to be covered? Would it not be very easy to get around this bill by simply having a man go along to the railroad stations and leave these films?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It would, and my personal opinion is, although I am not a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that such an amendment would strengthen the bill. I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois, that if it does not impair its consideration by the Senate, I think it would be very opportune to so amend it. However, if such an amendment should not be adopted, the bill would not be without the most salutary results, for many reasons, one of which in particular I will undertake to state.

Mr. MANN. I do not think such an amendment would impair the prospects of the bill passing at all. I have not the amendment here now, but I did suggest to the gentleman from Georgia the other day that if he had an amendment that would cover it in a few words I would approve of it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I had the good fortune to see the gentleman's amendment on another occasion, and I have no objection to accepting it.

Mr. MANN. I have not the amendment here, and I thought perhaps the gentleman from Georgia had it among his papers.

Mr. RODDENBERY. No; I have not. But if the amendment referred to is not adopted the present bill would still be salutary and effective. It is well known that one of the chief inducements and incentives to these prize fights now is the sale of the films under contracts, and the fact they could not be transmitted in commerce and through the mails would so depreciate that aspect of the prize-fight business that the bill would be very vital in its wholesome effects. I should be glad to have the bill most effective for accomplishment of its purpose and would favor the amendment suggested.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that the recent prize fight which was had in New Mexico presented, perhaps, the grossest instance of base fraud and bogus effort at a fair fight between a Caucasian brute and an African biped beast that has ever taken place. It was repulsive. This bill is designed to prevent the display to morbid-minded adults and susceptible youth all over the country of representations of such a disgusting exhibition.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. SHARP. I wish to ask the gentleman if he thinks it more indefensible for a white man and a black man to engage in a prize fight than for two white men to engage in such a conflict?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The act as a matter of moral conduct is the same. It differs in degree. No man descended from the old Saxon race can look upon that kind of a contest without abhorrence and disgust.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia has fully explained the bill. The object of it is to prevent demoralizing pictures from being exhibited all over the country—pictures which do not do any good, and might do much harm.

I desire to ask if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wishes to consume any time?

Mr. MANN. I would like to have some time.

Mr. SIMS. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. MANN. Five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am quite in accord with the desire to prevent the transportation of films or any other matter relating to prize fights.

However, I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to another part of the bill. The bill first makes it unlawful to transport from one State to another these films and other pictorial representations, and then it provides—

> Or to bring or cause to be brought into the United States from abroad any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.

Mr. SIMS. Is the gentleman reading the original bill, or the bill as amended, or the Senate bill as introduced?

Mr. MANN. I asked for a copy of the bill, and I received a copy of it as amended, probably. How does it provide now, under the language that I have read, if it still remains in the bill in that way?

Mr. SIMS. As reported by the House, it reads as follows:

> SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or to bring or cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.
> SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to take or receive from the mails, or any express company or other common carrier, with intent to sell, distribute, circulate, or exhibit, any matter or thing herein forbidden to be deposited for mailing, delivery, or carriage in interstate commerce.
> SEC. 3. And person violating any of the provisions of this act may be proceeded against by indictment and tried and punished, either in the district in which the unlawful matter was deposited for mailing or carriage, or to which it is carried, or in which it is delivered; and any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall for each and every offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BUTLER. Where is that bill?

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the bill reported again, Mr. Speaker. It is only a short bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill again, without objection.

There was no objection.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I examined this bill when it came over, and the House bill. A moment ago I received a copy of the Senate bill as introduced in the Senate. The question I was going to raise was eliminated by the action of the Senate. I hope the bill may pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MURRAY rose.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts want any time?

Mr. MURRAY. I do.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], while this matter was being considered, might refer to the consideration of the bill that we had on the 1st day of July, as outlined in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 8551. Some of the Members of the House may remember that on that day the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] sought to have the bill taken from the Speaker's table, as has been done at this time, in order to put this bill through quite speedily. I had received on that day a telegram from a resident of the congressional district that I represent inquiring about the status of this legislation, and I had gone to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] with a request for information in order that I might reply to the request of a constituent whom I represent here. I had hoped on that occasion that there might be a long enough delay in the consideration of the matter so that I might advise my constituent about the course of the legislation.

I was very sorry that I could not convince the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that that was a proper and reasonable request, and that he insisted upon the consideration of the measure at that time. As he did so, I had to make use of the only parliamentary weapon that was available to me, namely, to suggest to the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. ALEXANDER] the absence of a quorum, which I did. I was very sorry to read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the next morning a remark attributed to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a bill on the Speaker's table, to prevent the shipping through the mails and in interstate commerce of moving-picture films of prize fights, especially the one between a negro and a white man to be held in New Mexico on the 4th of July next, and the point of order is made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] to defeat the present consideration of that bill, as it will be too late to get it passed before that date if not considered now.

Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, I say, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], in the course of this discussion to-day, has not seen fit to set the RECORD right and to assure the Members of the House of what he now knows to be true, if he did not know it at the time that he made that remark—that my sole purpose in suggesting the absence of a quorum on the 1st of July was not to defeat the present consideration of this legislation, nor in order to postpone the consideration of it, except so long as it might be necessary to do in order for me to get a reply to a reasonable request for information from one whom I was trying here to represent.

I have no opposition to offer to this legislation. I do not know that it is altogether necessary. I do know that in my own Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and in the city of Boston, from which I come, we are able under our local laws, under our statutes, and our municipal ordinances to regulate such things as moving pictures of prize-fight exhibitions.

We do not need to occupy the time of the National Congress to regulate such matters, and I doubt very much whether there is any State in this Union that needs to have the time of this Congress taken up in the regulation of its internal affairs. I wonder what it is that causes men from the Southland, who in this Hall have always insisted upon the doctrine of State rights, to arise and urge with such great seriousness that legislation of this kind be passed? I do not believe it is necessary for the National Government to invade the States of the Union and tell them what they shall and shall not do in this situation; and I suggest to Members that we might in these days be giving our attention to problems of much more concern to the American people than this one, rather than to allow men here to demagogue along certain lines. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in respect to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] has said, that I am confident he has stated the facts just as they were. I do not now remember just what happened at the time. I knew that if the bill was not considered at that time it could not possibly become a law before the 4th of July, which was the time set for this contest in New Mexico. I want to state further that I was being bombarded by letters and telegrams requesting me to get the matter acted on, which accounted for my anxiety at the time. I did not want to misrepresent the gentleman, and if anything I said did misrepresent him, I am exceedingly glad to correct it. I have nothing to suggest, except this, that the gentleman from Massachusetts has never had charge of a piece of legislation like this, when letters and telegrams come in floods from every direction. He does not know, perhaps, just how a man feels under such circumstances. What I did was at the direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I felt even a greater responsibility than I would have felt if I had been acting on my own account.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. BATHRICK. I desire to know if in the bill, as reported from the Senate, in lines 9 and 10, the words "or any record or account of the same" were included?

Mr. SIMS. The Senate bill is on the Speaker's table and has been read twice. I have no copy of it here, but my recollection is that those words are contained in it.

Mr. BATHRICK. I request that information from the Clerk.

Mr. MANN. A moment ago, when the Clerk read it, I was comparing it with the bill I had in my hand, and I thought the words were not in the Senate bill; but I have just examined the Senate bill, and they are there. I think they ought to be stricken out.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to yield the floor, Mr. Speaker. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 25 minutes, and has 35 minutes left.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if amendments are in order.

The SPEAKER. If anybody can get the floor, he can offer amendments.

Mr. SIMS. The only reason I personally object to this amendment is that, with the great amount of privileged business of the greatest importance that is before the Senate, I doubt very much whether an amendment can be considered in the Senate. I suppose the gentleman has reference to the mere reporting of bets as a news item.

Mr. BATHRICK. That is what I have reference to, and I consider it vicious. A newspaper man, in the performance of his ordinary work of news gathering, if these words are permitted to remain in the bill, can be arrested and receive all of the penalties prescribed in the bill for those who distribute the prize-fight films.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SIMS. Not for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. For the purpose of making remarks?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BATHRICK. I only want about two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, in lines 9 and 10 of this bill are these words:

Or any record or account of betting on the same.

I am entirely in accord with the moral purpose of preventing the dissemination of immoral literature or films exhibited for the purpose of making money on prize fights, but I protest against a bill which will permit the full penalty which is prescribed for an infraction of this law, if it pass, being inflicted on a newspaper man who transmits accounts by mail or otherwise of bets on a prize fight in a State where that prize fight is entirely legal under the laws of that State. And I desire to offer an amendment striking out of lines 9 and 10 the words "or any record or account of betting on the same."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not yield for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. Five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman yielded to me before the Clerk had read the bill I thought this language was not in the bill as the Clerk read it. However, I was mistaken. The words "or any record or account of betting on the same" are in the bill. The bill, which is a Senate bill, makes it unlawful to bring into the country, or to cause to be brought into the country, any record or account of betting on a prize fight, and then makes it unlawful for any purpose to take or receive from the mails any matter which is covered by section 1, which would be the importation or bringing into the country of a record of betting on a prize fight, and makes that a fineable offense; so that under the terms of the bill, unless amended, any person who receives a foreign newspaper which contains any record of a prize fight, or any betting on a prize fight, and who takes it out of the mail is made subject to a penalty of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the amendment as passed by the Senate?

Mr. MANN. That bill was reported into the House by the committee and was passed in the Senate, and now the question is whether we will pass it and make it a law. The purpose of the bill is to prevent taking films—moving pictures—of prize fights and passing them from one State to another. It never was the purpose of the bill, or ought not to have been, to prevent a person taking out of the mails a Canadian newspaper or a London newspaper which contains some notice of a prize fight.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman does not insist that this bill will prohibit a thing of that sort?

Mr. MANN. Why, absolutely.

Mr. SIMS. Just read it:

Which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.

It must be the intention to publish the same.

Mr. MANN. It says:

Any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.

The limitation about using it for purposes of public exhibition is a limitation on the films and not a limitation upon the other. That is as clear as can be. There is no use of leaving that in the bill. The gentleman ought to be willing to permit an amendment striking it out.

Section 2 of this bill is clearly unconstitutional unless the court shall construe it to mean that what it does not say. Section 2 of the bill covers intrastate commerce, when we have no power over anything except interstate commerce. I hope the gentleman will yield or will himself offer an amendment to strike out of the end of section 1 the words—

Or any record or account of betting on the same.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not see how the country is to be benefited by reading the records of bets upon prize fights in this country or in any other country; and if it does prevent such records being published, well and good. We are legislating for the whole country. I do not see that there is anything very wrong in prohibiting a newspaper in this country from publishing records of bets on prize fights, be they between white men or between colored men or between white and colored men.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the gentleman in a bill to prohibit newspapers enjoying the second-class mail privilege from being deposited in the mail when they contain any record of betting on prize fights or anything whatever about prize fights. But this bill makes it an offense to receive the paper. It could not make it an offense to mail a foreign paper from a foreign land, because we have no control over the mailing of it. It makes it an offense to take it out when it is addressed to one.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true, because section 2 begins with the language that it shall be unlawful to send or receive.

Mr. SIMS. I fail to catch that idea when the bill says it shall be designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition.

Mr. BUTLER. But that does not relate to subsequent statements.

Mr. SIMS. A man can not commit a crime unintentionally.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand; and I do not believe the gentleman intends to impose a penalty upon an innocent person, but why not make the bill plain? It is not intended to punish a man who innocently receives a newspaper which contains the account of a prize fight or the betting on a prize fight. Let me suggest to the gentleman to amend his bill so as to make it perfectly plain. We all want to vote for the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Its language is taken from existing laws with reference to other matters. I do not think there is any great danger of anybody going to prison wrongfully, or of even being prosecuted, and, as I say, I have no idea that if an amendment, however innocent or harmless it may be, is put upon this bill that it will receive consideration at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BUTLER. The purpose of the bill is to strike at transportation. Is there a law which prohibits the exhibition of prize-fight pictures in the District of Columbia and the Territories over which we have control?

Mr. SIMS. I do not remember now.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not important to prevent the exhibition of these films in the District of Columbia, and not to try alone to prevent the transportation of them from State to State?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman know that in the rush and hurry of getting out a daily newspaper, with the numerous employees, that they are liable to transgress this law, and that they will be repeatedly liable to the penalties prescribed therein if this bill is passed as it stands?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] what his amendment is; I know what the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] is.

Mr. MANN. The amendment is to strike out the words "or any record or account of betting on the same."

Mr. SIMS. They are both practically the same. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to pass a bill that is unenforceable or put in words which my friend from Illinois thinks will cause any trouble to his friends who publish a paper, or to my friend from Ohio or elsewhere, and I will move to amend the bill so as to strike out the words in line 2, page 2, "or any," and all of line 3.

Mr. MANN. That is at the end of section 1.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate bill, page 2, by striking out, in lines 2 and 3, the words "or any record or account of betting on the same."

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to ask if there is no law on the books prohibiting the exhibition of these films in the District of Columbia and the Territories over which we have control why not amend the bill now so that these exhibitions may be prohibited? Does not the gentleman think this is the proper time?

Mr. SIMS. That is another and entirely different subject.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be possible to obtain these films, although we may pass this law. It is the exhibition, I understand, we desire to prevent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the Senate bill, which the gentleman from Tennessee has offered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether an amendment in the sixth line of the bill, after the word "carriage," would be acceptable, to insert the words "or to send or carry," so that it would read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or any other common carrier for carriage, or to send or carry from one State or Territory of the United States, etc.

I want to add the words "or to send or carry."

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection to that amendment, since it is going to the Senate. I think it is a proper one.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by inserting, after the word "carriage," in line 6 of the Senate bill, the words "or to send or carry."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this bill is broad enough to prohibit reports of prize fights between man and man, between man and animal, and between animals?

Mr. SIMS. It has nothing to do with prize fights between man and "animals" or between animals, if there are any such occurrences.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the bill does have to do with prize fights.

Mr. SIMS. No; it has to do with films; pictures of prize fights.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know whether the language of the bill is not as follows: On page 1, beginning with line 8, it says:

Or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists under whatever name.

It does deal with reports of prize fights, and are these prize fights between men, or are they between animals and men, or between animals alone?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as I am not an expert on prize fights, I can not answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I know that any man or any set of men who engage in prize fights are nothing more than animals for the time being, but what I desire to know is if the language of the bill will be broad enough to include reports on prize fights of whatever character, whether prize fights between man and man, whether prize fights between man and animals, or fights between animals? I want to make the bill broad enough to include reports of bull fights. The transportation through the mails of pictorial films of such prize fights ought to be prohibited. "Bull fighting" is certainly demoralizing, as much so as prize fighting between pugilists; both ought to be prohibited.

Mr. SIMS. I yielded for a question, and not for a speech.

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking the gentleman——

Mr. SIMS. I will say to the gentleman I will not accept the amendment or agree to it. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. I could not accept an amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to ask the gentleman once more, between what character of living beings is the report of prize fighting referred to in this bill intended to apply?

Mr. SIMS. I will leave to the gentleman to judge from the language of the bill what kind of beings it refers to.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman decline to answer?

Mr. SIMS. I am not an expert on that, and I can not give the information.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill is ambiguous in reference to that point.

Mr. SIMS. It may be to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. It is from the gentleman who has charge of the bill I am seeking information.

Mr. SIMS. And I am unable to give it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the passage of this measure. I am opposed with all the vigor that is in me to the exhibition of these prize-fight films to men, women, and children. Is it not possible to amend this bill so as to prevent their exhibition in the District of Columbia and the Territories, over which we have control, and if there is no law to prevent the exhibition of such films, let us make the law now. The injury comes in the exhibition of these films and not in their transportation.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I have agreed to two amendments, which I think are sufficient.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to press it on the gentleman, but I believe that we should amend the bill so as to prevent the exhibitions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amended Senate bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to offer such an amendment?

Mr. SIMS. No, Mr. Speaker; I can not yield for any further amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. I know I am powerless in my effort for good.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like recognition for the purpose of offering an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is this: The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has an hour, and he can parcel out the time to suit himself or use the entire hour, and nobody can offer an amendment as long as the gentleman from Tennessee has the floor during that hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire, then, to make a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Then is it possible in the American Congress that a man can call up a bill, utilize all the time, and prevent any other Member from offering an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The practice is that when a bill is called up like this that the man in charge of it has an hour. He can do as he pleases with that hour. Of course, within the rules he can move the previous question on it the first thing, or he can reserve the previous question until the last thing in the hour, and he can shut anybody out from offering an amendment during the hour. Now the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves the previous question.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill as amended to final passage.

Mr. FOWLER. Then under what stage can an amendment be offered to the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered, it can never be offered. If the previous question is voted down, then, when the gentleman from Tennessee gets through with his hour and any other gentleman gets the floor, he can move any sort of an amendment he pleases.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill, with the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to the committee from which it came, with the following instructions——

The SPEAKER. It never came from any committee.

Mr. FOWLER. It came from the Senate and was not referred to any committee in the House. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to move to commit this bill to the Committee on Claims with the following instructions, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The point of order is that it is not in order to make a motion to recommit a Senate bill from the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, as a substitute for the House bill, to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I think that under the rules there can be only one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman misstates his motion, but, of course that is a small matter. It is not a motion to recommit, but a motion to commit. The gentleman has a right to move to commit to any committee in the House.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to commit it, then, Mr. Speaker, to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with the instructions which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to commit.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of committing this bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will, as their names are called, vote "yea," and those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6596. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the town of Fort Fairfield, in the State of Maine; and

S. 7130. An act to provide for the establishment of an immigration station at Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, and the erection of a public building on a site to be selected for said station.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. SHIVELY in place of Mr. GORE as one of the conferees on the bill (S. 4568) granting an increase of pension to Annie R. Schley.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution (H. Res. 634):

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 7130. An act to provide for the establishment of an immigration station at Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia, and the erection of a public building on a site to be selected for said station; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

S. 6596. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the town of Fort Fairfield, in the State of Maine; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3815. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910.

HOMESTEADS UPON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 5545) providing for the issuing of patent to entrymen for homesteads upon reclamation projects may retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. On what calendar?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is on the Union Calendar and on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I ask that it be referred back to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, with permission to report at once. By direction of the committee I wish to make a supplemental report. I understand it must take that course.

Mr. MANN. I take it that what the gentleman wants is to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And, when reported back, that it retain its place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 21477) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask for the reading of the statement in lieu of the report?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the statement instead of the conference report on the river and harbor bill be read.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to suggest to the gentleman that the statement consists very largely of tabulated statements, which are less intelligible than the conference report itself, and the statement is about as long as the conference report.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest that we might get unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of either the report or the statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. There is no possibility of adopting something without having anything read.

The SPEAKER. Which does the gentleman ask to have read?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the conference report as follows:

S. M. SPARKMAN,
JOS. E. RANSDELL,
GEO. P. LAWRENCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, after a short statement covering the report of the conferees on this bill I shall ask its adoption.

As this bill left the House and went to the Senate it carried appropriations amounting to $24,062,520.50, cash appropriations, and $2,200,000 authorization for the Ohio River. As it came from the Senate and went to the conference committee it aggregated $34,083,530.50, the Senate having added to the bill $7,821,010. As a result of the conference the bill has been reduced to $33,259,370.50. In other words, a reduction of a little more than $800,000 in the aggregate of the bill was effected in conference.

A large part of this aggregate, placed in the bill by the Senate, consisted of $2,500,000 for the lower Mississippi River, for the purpose of reconstructing the levees. That was made desirable, if not indispensable, by the recent floods which visited the lower part of that river while the bill was pending in the Senate. The waters rose higher than they had ever risen before, certainly higher than they had been for many years, and breaking through the levees flooded a large section of country, destroying many lives and a large amount of property.

These flood conditions were so serious as to arouse the sympathy of the whole country, which, reaching the Senate, found expression in this amendment appropriating $2,500,000 for the purpose of aiding the people along the banks of the river in reconstructing and strengthening the levees there.

Perhaps I should say just here that Congress has for years been appropriating money for the construction of levees in connection with the States and local interests bordering the lower river.

A great deal of money has been thus expended—something like twenty-six millions by the Government and fifty-eight millions by the bordering States and local interests—but lately the Government engineers have directed their efforts toward revetment rather than levee work, so that less and less of the appropriations made by Congress have been expended of recent years on the latter than on the former. In this arrangement the people directly interested in levees there had acquiesced, and it was the hope of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when this bill was prepared that participation by the Government in that class of work would soon cease; but this flood came, breaking the levees in many places and destroying both life and property. Under these conditions the Senate thought it advisable to provide liberally for the work of reconstructing these levees. So they added that $2,500,000 to the bill. But for this addition the Senate amendments in the aggregate would not have been unduly large. They would only have amounted to about $5,000,000 more than the amount inserted by the House as we finally agreed to the bill, which is not out of proportion to the aggregate of amendments usually made by the Senate in river and harbor bills. There were inserted by the Senate 29 new projects, the reports on the most of which reached Congress after the river and harbor bill had been reported to the House. A majority of these, I dare say, would have been adopted by the House committee in the preparation of the bill if they had reached us in time, because most of them—indeed, all of them—are worthy projects. A few of them had been submitted before that time, such, for instance, as the Cape Fear River, N. C., below Wilmington; Cape Lookout harbor of refuge; Jamaica Bay, N. Y.; and the Allegheny River; but were not favorably considered by the River and Harbor Committee in the preparation of a bill such as this, which was framed along conservative lines. They were large projects, involving large expenditures, and perhaps not so urgent as others, and we thought they, among a large number of others omitted, could easily wait until another bill, when we could deal more generously with the projects throughout the country. But the Senate, having, of course, the right to amend the bill, saw proper to insert these provisions, and after a lengthy conference between the members of the conference committee, both on the part of the House and of the Senate, during which they were carefully considered, we finally concluded to let them remain in the bill.

Jamaica Bay is a part of New York Harbor, and bids fair to become a very important part of that harbor, which is the most important in the country and should receive every consideration, nor have I found Congress backward in making every provision for its improvement. Whatever it really needs for the purpose of carrying on the great and growing commerce there Congress has ever been ready to give. Another project which came in after the bill had left the House, which we permitted to remain in the bill, and without serious objection, was the Chicago Harbor. This is likewise a very important place. True the commerce is not as large as that of New York, but it is a very large commerce and one that should be encouraged. As the purpose of these appropriations is to benefit commerce we should not be parsimonious when it comes to dealing with such places as New York, Chicago, and other large commercial harbors. But, as I said a moment ago, all the projects adopted by the Senate are important. I do not think there is one in the bill that ought not to be there. Possibly some of them might have been left out of the bill, which we intended to be a conservative measure, but the Senate did not see it that way, or at least did not agree with us so far as these projects were concerned, and as we could not have our way in everything we agreed to the report as it has been submitted to the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Referring to page 43 of the bill, I see that three amendments have been inserted, numbered 60, 61, and 62. The first of these is for the purpose, as I understand it, of raising and strengthening the levees about the city of Cairo, Ill., on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and in the Cairo drainage district, $250,000. I wanted to ask whether or not those levees belong to the Government.

Mr. SPARKMAN. They belong to the Government in the same sense that most of the levees belong to the Government. They are supposed to be in the interest of commerce. We have gone ahead and constructed levees along the banks of the Mississippi River upon the theory, so far as we are concerned, that they are, in a measure, aids to commerce.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What I want to ask is, Did the Government construct the levees?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understand not. I understand they were constructed by the States or by subdivisions of the States along the banks of the river.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is the same thing true for the raising and strengthening of the levees at Mound City, Ill., on the Ohio River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The same, I believe.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Am I to understand that it is now the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to appropriate money to build levees and to strengthen and rebuild them where they have been built by others than the Government, to protect the adjacent country from flood?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In answer to that I will say that we do not undertake in this bill to lay down any policy. In all of these items, and there are three of them—the Mississippi River, Mound City, and Cairo—the appropriations are made upon the theory that they present cases of emergency, that it is work that should be done immediately, all as the result of floods, and, so far as the General Government is concerned, also upon the theory that it is in the interest of navigation. As I said, I do not know just what the policy hereafter is going to be, but we certainly do not intend to establish a precedent upon which similar appropriations may be predicated in the future, nor at any time, for the sole protection of private property.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Have we ever made appropriations before under similar conditions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I expect so. I do not recall going very far away from the Mississippi River heretofore, nor do we do that in this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman recall any place where the Government has appropriated money heretofore under similar conditions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not for levee work, except in the interest of navigation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. For the strengthening or the building of levees which were built by others than the Government?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not recall any levee work except as just stated.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am asking for information. I have not been a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee for a great many years, and this is the first instance that I have known. It does seem to me that it is a departure from the policy that we have heretofore followed, and unless my memory is at fault we have rejected these very items when they were before our committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not recall about that.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the gentleman on that. I do not think these items were before our committee before.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The question of this Cairo project certainly was.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I do not recall its having been before our committee at any time before. I will say that the reason why it was put on at this time is that it was so closely connected with the Mississippi. We are building levees upon the opposite side. The Mississippi River Commission has for years had jurisdiction up to Cape Girardeau, which is considerably north of Cairo. It has not been building levees on the east bank, and therefore has not contributed to these Cairo levees, but it has been building on this side, and the raising of those levees over there on the other side by the Government has certainly raised it considerably on the Illinois side. Now, that fact was pressed upon the committee very strongly, and the further fact we were building levees just on the opposite side and this is really a part of the levee system of the Mississippi River, though we have not heretofore contributed for these Cairo levees. The situation there was different from many other sections of the country. There the waters of the Ohio come in conjunction with the Missouri and the upper Mississippi and create an entirely different situation from that which prevails anywhere else.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I understand about these floods, but I think the gentleman must have misunderstood my question. It does not seem to me it is possible—I may be mistaken—about the mayor of Cairo appearing before our committee and explaining this whole situation and asking for an appropriation.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That was after our bill had been reported.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. After our bill had been reported.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. The bill had been reported to the House, and it was before the Senate, and they went before the Senate and they had a hearing and they asked to be heard by us, so that our conferees might fully understand the situation. And they were heard there.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think the gentleman is quite right, and it was way after the bill was in the Senate, and they made a strong showing before us.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not opposing this item in the bill, but I do think it is well to call the attention of the House to the fact that we were now departing from the policy, in my judgment, which we have always pursued; and, as I understand it, we are now beginning to appropriate money for the strengthening and building of levees to prevent floods. Now, I do not know whether that is a good policy or not, but I think we are starting upon a policy which you are not going to limit very long to the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. I think there are demands coming from other portions of the country, and we will be called upon to take care of flooded districts other than those along the Mississippi. I have always voted in the committee in favor of these appropriations, but I think we ought to start upon this matter with our eyes open, knowing when these items go into the bill we will be placed in the position of having to take care of other flooded countries, a great many of which are not in the Mississippi Valley. Take the floods in the Sacramento River of California, where a tremendous amount of damage——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the gentleman desire some time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I did not mean right now, because I am not through.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Only a sentence more. I wanted to call the attention of the House to these items and suggest that we ought to know what we are voting on when we adopt them. We are starting now upon a policy that will never end so long as the Republic will last. In a few years we will be spending fifty millions annually to protect communities from floods. We have now definitely abandoned the policy that we appropriate money only for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, following the line of questions pursued by the gentleman who has just taken his seat; in my district, in the city of Augusta, we have had exactly the same trouble they have had along the Mississippi River. It comes from the periodical flooding of a great section of the country by a great navigable river. I want to know if, in the opinion of the gentleman, in regard to aiding one section of the country, and I am heartily in favor of aiding it, whether the same principle will not apply to other sections of the country that are circumstanced like the Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will answer yes; but, as a matter of fact, we have never in the building of levees gotten far from the Mississippi River, and I want to call attention to another thing, that although the great political parties of the country—I refer to the Democratic and Republican Parties, not to the proposed new party——

Mr. HARDWICK. Or the Socialist Party?

Mr. SPARKMAN (continuing). In their platforms recently seem to carve out the Mississippi River and segregate it from the balance of the country. I do not think we are very close even now to the adoption anywhere of the policy of levee building without local cooperation.

Mr. HARDWICK. But where there is cooperation, does not the gentleman think there ought to be Government aid?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; not in every case. We are not, I think, to get very far from the Mississippi River, and even then should not, I think, go beyond the demands of navigation. If you will examine into the matter, you will find that the appropriations convey the idea that the localities are to contribute an equal or at least some amount. That is what the people along the Mississippi River have been doing for many years. Indeed, they have contributed an aggregate during the years of levy building much greater than that contributed by the Federal Government. And even with that, as I said a little while ago, we have been trying to get away from levee building. We had started out on the policy of revetting the banks of the Mississippi River at cost of ninety-odd million dollars from Cairo to the Head of Passes.

Much study of the problem of the improvement of the lower Mississippi River, into which study both observation of and experience with that stretch of the river had entered, led the Mississippi River Commission and the Government engineers to the conclusion that revetment work and bank protection were the most potential for the improvement and maintenance of the navigable features of that river. It was believed that by the revetment of the banks at certain localities erosion could be stopped and the washing of the banks into the river prevented, and that by confining the waters at low stages to a relatively small channel the river would be deepened to the required depth without much dredging. It was further believed by the engineers that even during periods of overflow these revetments would hold the banks in place and maintain the integrity of the channel. So that finally it was determined to limit the improvement of this stretch of the river almost exclusively to revetment work, and as the cost of this would be very heavy the people directly interested, recognizing its importance, agreed, as I am informed, that the Government should confine its activities in the improvement there almost, if not exclusively, to that class of work and work of a kindred character. So that two years ago, and in the bill of 1910, we adopted the policy of revetting the banks under a project to cost some ninety-odd millions of dollars, appropriations for which were to be made in annual bills and in such amounts as would complete that great work in a period of about 18 years. This is a large sum of money, to be sure, but it is an important project, and should be completed as early as practicable, considering Treasury conditions and the necessities of other projects and other river and harbor works throughout the country. Hence the advisability of adhering to that policy and only departing from it in cases of great emergency.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one more question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understood the gentleman to say the Mississippi River was the single instance in which the Federal Government had appropriated for building levees.

Mr. SPARKMAN. For building levees.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the gentleman sure about his facts in reference to that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think of none just now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman know that any money has been spent for building levees on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; a great deal; and an appropriation has been made in this bill for that purpose.

Mr. HARDWICK. Requiring State or local cooperation?

Mr. RUSSELL. Did the gentleman ask me the question? I will state in my own State the Government has built some levees independent. The county has made up levee and drainage districts and levies a tax upon the benefits to be derived, and they contribute in part to the building of the levee system.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to say the committee over which the gentleman presides has been both just and generous to the district which I have the honor to represent here, and I am not complaining.

Mr. SMALL. Not generous, but just.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just and generous both; I will put it that way; but I did not want the statement to go unchallenged on this floor that because specific reference was made in the platforms of the Democratic or Republican parties to the Mississippi River and its improvements that the same principle does not apply and must not apply, in justice and fairness, whenever a navigable river is interstate in its character and where something like approximately the same situation as that in the Mississippi Valley would result unless Federal aid were extended to prevent it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is hard to differentiate perhaps, but we have for years confined that class of work practically to the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not want the gentleman to foreclose that question against us. For one, I shall contend very strenuously that the principle must be applied equally to every navigable river and to every section of our country.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. Am I right in understanding that the appropriation of $25,000 for the Connecticut River that was in the bill and that was put out in the Senate is now in the conference?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a few remarks on that subject, but it is a local question, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a few remarks. I do want to say something.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] finished?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not just yet. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would like to ask some questions.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire?

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman now a question in reference to amendment No. 37, as to the granting of rights, privileges, and authority to Louis M. Tisdale and the transfer of such to the said South Mobile Co., and so forth. I do not think that really belongs to a river and harbor bill. If so, is it properly safeguarded?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Why, I should think it is not in an improper place in the river and harbor bill. What was the other question? Was it whether it was sufficiently safeguarded?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We considered this matter very carefully, both when it was before our committee and in the conference committee. We had it up before the House committee, but did not insert it in the bill.

Mr. MANN. That was the trouble. We had no chance to consider it in the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Afterwards it was inserted in the Senate. The conferees considered it very carefully, and it remained. We thought it sufficiently safeguarded.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I will try to answer the question. This was taken up in the Senate, and I was requested by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to come over and give some information in regard to it, and I gave all the information I had. The bill was referred to the War Department, thoroughly sifted there, and reported back in the language it was thought proper to accomplish the legislation. Senator BURTON, of Ohio, then chairman of the River and Harbor Committee of the House, drafted the law as it was enacted in the river and harbor act of 1905.

As a member of the Senate committee the same gentleman considered the report from the War Department and redrafted it in the Senate committee. Every amendment suggested by him seemed to me proper and to fully protect the Government and the interests of commerce. I thought the item as it came from the Senate was sufficient. It appears the conferees of the House did not think so, and they amended it as it now appears in the conference report.

Now, for the gentleman's further information I will state this: The act of 1905 gave a franchise to Louis M. Tisdale and his assigns. He went to work dredging the channel. One of those storms that come sometimes over the Gulf washed away pretty much all the work which had been done. It was delayed perhaps a year; it may be longer. He started the work again, but before the time expired under the original limitation he was unable to go further.

A corporation was organized—I do not know the details of it—called the South Mobile Terminal Co., which was capable financially of carrying the work to a successful termination. And upon their recommendation, after the time seemed to have expired—my opinion is that under the original act the time had not expired—it was submitted to the War Department, and their legal adviser, the Judge Advocate General, gave it as his opinion it was quite a doubtful proposition, and advised that before the South Mobile Terminal Co. undertook to do anything the time had better be extended. My own opinion to-day is that there was nothing making it necessary to extend the time. There was nothing making it necessary to transfer it to the South Mobile Terminal Co., because the original franchise was given to Louis M. Tisdale and his assigns. The first law gave full authority for the assignment, but as there was some question about it the parties interested presented this item as you see it now to the Senate, after the river and harbor bill had passed the House at this session. And while it was being considered by the Senate, as I have stated before, I was requested to come before the Senate committee and give them some information, which was about what I have given to the gentleman. I will say, further, that the Government improvement at Mobile is quite extensive. The channel at Mobile is 33 miles long; including the outer bar at Fort Morgan it is 40 miles long. It is very difficult to get further appropriation immediately around Mobile, because the main proposition absorbs the attention of the General Government. We could not expect to get a General Government appropriation for this proposition. I do not think it can possibly be furnished unless it is done through parties financially able to conduct it to a completion.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will yield for a moment on that point——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In 1905 the House passed a river and harbor bill. It went to the Senate. The Senate inserted an item in regard to this, which was finally agreed to in conference. The House knew nothing about it and knows nothing about it to-day——

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; the gentleman misunderstands——

Mr. MANN. With the exception of the gentleman from Alabama, and possibly he——

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. No; you misunderstand.

Mr. MANN. I am stating facts of my own knowledge.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. It was passed in 1905 through the House—the original bill.

Mr. MANN. It was inserted in the original river and harbor bill in the Senate in 1905.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will take the gentleman's statement for it, but I think it was.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. As I remember, Mr. BURTON was then chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and he drafted the original bill and it was done in the House.

Mr. MANN. That may be the fact. But now it comes to the House in a proposition inserted in the Senate. We have a Unanimous-Consent Calendar in the House, and there is no difficulty about passing a bill concerning which there is no question. They have a rule in the Senate—Calendar Rule VIII—and under it there is no difficulty in passing a bill concerning which there is no question.

Here is a proposition to give a franchise to somebody to build a channel. Are they going to pay tolls for passing over or through this channel? Is there to be a charge for passing over this channel? Why is a private person or corporation building a channel to the sea, down there, unless there is to be a charge down there? I do not know whether there is to be a charge down there, or what it is, and no one else knows about it.

If the bill is proper, it could have been introduced here by the gentleman from Alabama and reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and placed on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar and passed, or passed on the Private Calendar, without difficulty.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MANN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. The bill was introduced by "the gentleman from Alabama," but it was not considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It was introduced by me last December.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt but that, if the bill had no question about it, the gentleman from Alabama could easily have had it reported by the committee of which he is a member. There is no doubt about that proposition.

Now, may I ask the gentleman a question in reference to another item?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What is the reason for inserting in a number of these appropriating items the language "which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work"?

Mr. SPARKMAN. There were two reasons for that. So far as I am concerned, I wanted to emphasize the fact that it is an emergency, so that it may not set a precedent on which other appropriations in the future can be predicated. Still other members of the conference committee, no doubt, had in mind the proposed and old enactments in regard to the hours of labor, and it was for the purpose of taking this class of work out of the eight-hour law. Whether the provision will have that effect I do not know, but, so far as I am concerned, it was done for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that the conditions presented an emergency, and that the appropriation was not to be considered as a precedent.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to make a further answer to that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; go ahead.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. As a Representative from the region of the Mississippi River, where both of these items are made to apply, I wish to say that they are applicable solely to levee work. We passed an eight-hour bill, which was signed by the President last month, if I mistake not, under the specific terms of which levees are considered extraordinary emergency work and not subject to the terms of the eight-hour law. That bill does not go into effect until the 1st of January next. Now, levees are in every sense of the term different from every other kind of work that I am acquainted with. We have a great deal of rain on the lower Mississippi River. It rains there more than it does in most other places. We have never been able to devise any machinery entirely suitable for constructing levees. The levees are nearly all built with scrapers and mules. The season for building them is very limited. We are obliged to rush the work just as rapidly as we possibly can when we begin, and it is necessary to work long hours. It costs a great deal more if you have to do that work under the general eight-hour law, and it was to avoid that, to be entirely frank, that this clause was inserted, knowing that it had already been made a part of the general law, which, however, does not go into effect until the 1st of January next.

Let me say further that for many years levees have been considered extraordinary emergency works, and were so considered until a recent decision of the court declared that they were not emergency works, and then it was found necessary to legislate on the subject.

Mr. MANN. Then I understand the gentleman is quite desirous of having an eight-hour law apply at every place except where he himself happens to have interests?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Not at all, sir.

Mr. MANN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on Calendar Wednesday next the unfinished business of the House is a bill to apply the eight-hour law to all river and harbor work, drawn in such language as to include the Army officers and Army engineers and the Mississippi River Commission. If the gentleman is interested in that subject, he had better scan that bill.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will be very glad to scan the bill.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that all the levee work provided for in this bill, at least $4,000,000 of it on the Mississippi River, is to be considered as outside the eight-hour law?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That is my understanding, and it was always considered outside the eight-hour provision until a recent decision of a Federal court.

Mr. MANN. Ordinary levee work is not extraordinary, and there is no more reason why the eight-hour law should not apply to that than why it should not apply to any other work.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. If the gentleman were familiar with the facts, I think he would have a different opinion. Ordinary work is done where men are protected from the weather, where they can go in houses, where they are perhaps down in a mine, where they can go on with their work day after day. It is a physical impossibility to move dirt when it is wet, and after it rains you have got to wait several days before you can move any more of the dirt. It rains there very frequently, and you are compelled to take time by the forelock and rush that work tremendously, or you would never get it done.

Mr. MANN. That applies no more to levee work than it does when you are constructing the subbasement of a building or preparing to put the foundations in. It is not half as true of levee work as it was with reference to the foundations of the new post-office building over here by the Union Station. Yet we have to apply the eight-hour law to that. I believe in the eight-hour law myself, and I do not believe in evading it as soon as it is passed; and I call the attention of the country to the fact that just the moment the law is placed upon the statute books this House inserts a concealed provision which does not convey any idea of the eight-hour law for the purpose of evading the eight-hour law.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the eight-hour law specifically exempts levees from its terms, and it does not go into effect until the 1st of January next, and that is why we put it in here and not with any attempt to evade the terms of the law. The gentleman must state it fairly. He ought not to state it unfairly, but he ought to state the facts.

Mr. MANN. If it is already specifically exempted, why do you put this in here to exempt it again?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Because under the terms of that law it does not go into effect until the 1st of January, and we propose this provision to cover the time between now and the 1st of January.

Mr. MANN. If the law does not go into effect until the 1st of January, why do you have to exempt this bill from the operations of it?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. It seems hard for the gentleman to understand anything. I stated that for years we had been working——

Mr. MANN. I think I understand it——

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Will the gentleman please let me talk a moment? I do not occupy the time of the House as often as the gentleman from Illinois does, and I should like to make this explanation. I said that for years and years——

Mr. MANN. I took the floor to ask a question, and the gentleman has been talking all the time ever since. I am quite willing he should proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Very well; with the gentleman's kind permission I should like to answer his question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor. I have the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Will the gentleman from Florida allow me to make a brief answer?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. The gentleman from Illinois seems trying to mix us up. I should like the House to understand that there was no necessity for a law of this kind until recently, because we built the levees without following the terms of the eight-hour law. We always considered levee building to be emergency work, and acting on that idea paid no attention to the eight-hour law until within a year or two—I forget the exact date—the question was raised in a United States court, and the court held that levee building was not extraordinary emergency work. Therefore, when the general eight-hour law was passed, which is now on the statute books, these levees were exempted from its terms; but as that law does not go into effect until the 1st of January next, it became necessary to make a special exemption in the case of the levee work that we propose to do under this present bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Work that is to be done in the meantime.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. To take effect in the meantime. That is the only idea.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I was not present when the gentleman began his remarks on the bill, and I should like to inquire in regard to amendment No. 2 of the Senate, on page 2, lines 18 to 23. There was an amendment adopted in conference cutting down the amount from $250,000, originally recommended by the engineers, to $125,000 for the Pollock Rip Shoal. The report from the Board of Engineers was not received in time to have the original provision put in the bill when the matter was being considered by the House committee. As I understand it, there was no division of feeling in the House committee as to the importance of this work.

Mr. SPARKMAN. None whatever.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. But the reduction was proposed for the reason that the Chief of Engineers thought it would not be practicable to spend more than $125,000 the present year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That was the reason it was reduced; yes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I wanted to have that clearly understood, because there were a very large number of mariners and men engaged in the coastwise trade who were very much interested in this improvement, which had been considered for a great many years, but was not recommended by the Board of Engineers on the ground that it was impracticable. Yet after a full consideration with a survey it was found to be a very practicable project, and it was thought that $250,000 would not be too great a sum to be provided for commencing the work.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think it is a very worthy project. We really gave a little more than the engineers said they could spend. They said they could only spend $100,000, but we placed the amount at $125,000.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. But the intention is to use this to begin the work, and as I understand the project has the approval of the committee, so that it may be expected, after this sum is expended, this project may be continued further?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It can be continued from year to year in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I assume it will be if the work shows that the improvement is worthy of extension.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The appropriation in this bill is $6,000,000 for the use of the Mississippi River, for that one purpose alone of building and constructing levees.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; that is a mistake. Four million dollare are appropriated for the purpose of constructing levees, expressly provided in this bill, and there are $2,000,000 beyond that, most of which is to be used for revetment work, but some for open channel work.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there a mistake in the print?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No.

Mr. BUTLER. I have it here, Mississippi River, House item, increased from $3,500,000 to $6,000,000. How much of the appropriation is to be used for the construction of levees?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman will find further down in the bill a statement that in view of the existing emergency $4,000,000 of money hereby appropriated is set apart for the construction and repair of levees.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a Senate amendment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How much money have we been appropriating heretofore for the construction of levees on the Mississippi River each year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is usually put in a lump sum, and a good deal of it has gone for revetment work, while some of it has been used for the construction of levees. I do not know just how much, but about $130,000, I believe, was used for that purpose last year.

Mr. BUTLER. The construction of levees is not a departure from the practice heretofore observed in making these appropriations?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. We have always appropriated for the construction of the levees. Do the States make appropriations for the construction of levees along the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. They have been doing so, and quite liberally.

Mr. BUTLER. This is simply the Government portion of the construction?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. There has been a statement made in the newspapers with respect to a change about to be made in the policy of the Government relative to the construction of these levees; that is, the policy of Congress in its treatment of the river is to be in some way altered or amended. Can the gentleman give me some explanation of that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know of no such contemplated change of policy. It was the intention of the engineers and of the Mississippi River Commission, so I am advised, to get away as much as possible from levee building. It appears that the project for that class of work had been very nearly completed, so that it would not have required much more money to complete, but these recent floods coming along makes an emergency, as is stated in the bill, and we appropriated and set apart a larger sum for that purpose than we at first intended to do or would otherwise have done.

Mr. BUTLER. This is not all an emergency appropriation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Four million dollars of it is.

Mr. BUTLER. Just one question more. Is it possible to estimate how much money will be required to construct these levees along the Mississippi River so as to protect the surrounding country from floods?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; that can not be estimated now. I suppose the engineers could do that, but it has not yet been done.

Mr. BUTLER. The engineers then have never been asked to make an estimate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. They have estimated, or the Mississippi River Commission has, and have outlined a certain project, which is nearly completed.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in my own time I will explain that.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the rivers and harbors bill, as it originally passed the House, there was an appropriation of $75,000 made for continuing the improvement upon the Youghiogheny River in Pennsylvania. In the Sixty-first Congress an appropriation of $100,000 was made, I believe, for improvements on that river. Work has been started in accordance with the appropriation that was made. Will the conferees explain to the House why that appropriation was permitted to be dropped from this conference report, in view of the fact that the Government has already expended $100,000, or has appropriated that much and is expending some of that amount? Why did the conferees agree to have that amount stricken from the original appropriation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. For the reason that it did not seem practicable to have the Senate conferees agree with us. I will say to the gentleman that this item, as he has correctly stated, was placed in the House bill by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and the bill passed the House with the item in it, but the Senate struck it out; and we for a long time refused to recede from our disagreement to the Senate's action. It went on for weeks; yes, months.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. For two months.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Two months from the first meeting of the conferees, before we finally agreed upon the bill, and that item was the very last that was considered by the conference committee.

It was the earnest desire of the conferees on the part of the House to have that item restored to the bill, but the Senate conferees did not agree to our views and request. It was contended that it lacked merit, and that further appropriation should not be made for it, at least not at this time. I did not agree with them about that, but it seemed necessary to yield to the views of the Senate conferees, else we would have spun out still further the conference deliberations, a thing not desirable, as the various works throughout the country had begun to suffer.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it is a wise public policy to appropriate $100,000 at one session of Congress and at the next to refuse to appropriate anything at all?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; perhaps not. I think myself that the appropriations ought to be continued and the work completed, and I think it likely that in the next bill we will take care of it.

I will say further that its omission now was through no neglect on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG], because in season and out of season he has been insisting upon that provision in the bill—even a larger appropriation—but we have done the best we could without unduly prolonging the deliberations of the conference committee.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. What was the reason assigned for the refusal? What reason was assigned for this other than the refusal of the Senate conferees to accept it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is a pretty big reason.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. I think the Members of the House are entitled to know what the reason is.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I stated that they said the project was not, in their judgment, a worthy project, or as worthy as the others in the bill.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Had not that question been adjudicated before?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; but they have the right to reopen it at any time, so far as that is concerned. The gentleman will soon have an opportunity to bring it up again.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the country and its commercial interest on the fact that we are now so near the final stages to the passage of this bill through Congress and its enactment into law. It may not be the best measure of the kind that ever became a law, but I do claim that it will compare favorably with any of them. It meets, I think, all requirements, and is the third in the series of annual bills commenced when we embarked upon that policy a little more than two years ago, a policy now, I hope and believe, firmly established and one from which we should not seek to depart. Under this policy, pursued as we are now pursuing it, only a few more years will elapse before we will see all our river and harbor improvements carried to completion, the whole constituting a system of navigable waterways better by far than that possessed by any other country in the world.

The SPEAKER. The question is——

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard before a vote is taken upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida has five minutes remaining.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND].

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take advantage of this opportunity, when the conference report on the river and harbor bill is before the House, to submit some remarks showing the wonderful development of the commerce of Oakland Harbor, Cal., since the first Government appropriation was made, in 1874, and to direct attention to the enterprise being displayed by the municipality of Oakland, which is expending in harbor improvement at the present time $2,500,000, this being but the beginning of a comprehensive plan that will require the ultimate expenditure of many additional millions.

The House conferees have wisely agreed to accept the amendment of the Senate adding $30,000 to the $100,000 carried for Oakland Harbor when the bill left the House. On February 1 of this year there was an unexpended balance to the credit of the Oakland Harbor improvement of $303,937.47. Existing contracts now cover this amount, which, with the $130,000 carried in the present bill added, will make a grand total of $433,937.47 to be expended by the Federal Government on Oakland Harbor during the present year and up to March 4 of next year, when another river and harbor bill will have become a law, providing an additional appropriation.

In view of the large unexpended balance available for Oakland Harbor when I appeared before the members of the River and Harbor Committee during the present session, which large balance prevented any estimates from being submitted by the War Department, I felt particularly gratified that the committee responded to my appeal for an appropriation, thus recognizing what the city of Oakland itself was doing, and realizing the necessity of placing this important port in readiness for the increased commerce anticipated with the opening of the Panama Canal.

The committee likewise granted my request for a resurvey of the harbor looking to the adoption of a new and enlarged project calling for increased depths and greater widths necessary to enable the port to keep pace with the recent rapid growth of Oakland and vicinity—a locality destined to become one of the chief shipping centers of the Pacific coast. The last survey was made as the result of an authorization contained in the river and harbor act of 1908. As a result of that survey the local engineer then in charge, Lieut. Col. John Biddle, recommended the project now under way, which provides for a channel 30 feet deep and 500 feet wide from the bay to the tidal basin, and 25 feet deep and 300 feet wide around the basin, with a depth of 18 feet through the tidal canal.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, located at Washington, disapproved this recommendation in December, 1909. A hearing was obtained before this board, the result of which is set forth in the following telegram to Mayor Frank K. Mott, of Oakland, who, with the chamber of commerce, furnished Oakland's representatives in Congress with much valuable data for use before the board:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 31, 1910.

Mayor FRANK K. MOTT, Oakland, Cal.:

Pleased to report that River and Harbor Board of Engineers, as result of hearing last Monday, have reversed their action and indorsed recommendation of Col. Biddle for improvement of Oakland Harbor. This action is rather unusual and can be regarded as great victory. Report must be approved by Chief of Engineers, but think there is little doubt of his approval. Fight will now be taken up with River and Harbor Committee of Congress.

J. R. KNOWLAND.

Since I became a Member of this body, in December, 1904, Congress has appropriated for Oakland Harbor, including the amount carried in the present bill, a total of $1,263,203. This amount is larger by nearly $400,000 than that appropriated for any corresponding period in the history of the improvement. During these eight years Congress has provided for two new surveys. Beginning with 1874, when the Government began the improvement, a grand total of $3,963,803 has been provided by Congress.

Oakland Harbor was developed from what was known prior to 1874 as San Antonio Creek, which waterway had a depth of but 2 feet at low tide, with a tidal range of about 5 feet. The commerce was then insignificant, amounting annually to but 154,300 tons, but has steadily increased with the development of the harbor until to-day the annual freight traffic amounts to over three and a half million short tons, with a total valuation of $138,059,278.

The three principal harbors of California which the Government is improving—which does not include San Francisco Harbor, because no Government project is under way—are Oakland, Los Angeles (formerly San Pedro and Wilmington Harbors), and the harbor at San Diego. The official commercial statistics for these three harbors, contained in the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1911, show that for San Diego Harbor the freight traffic amounted to 398,048 short tons, valued at $22,591,487; and for Los Angeles Harbor 1,709,294 tons, valued at $47,040,588; while Oakland Harbor, as already stated, is credited with 3,575,371 tons, valued at $138,059,278.

When the present river and harbor bill was pending in the House I took occasion to look up the commerce of the various harbors for which appropriations were carried, and found only eight where the commerce exceeded in actual tons that of Oakland Harbor.

Few localities have displayed a more generous spirit in cooperating with the Federal Government in the matter of harbor improvements. Mayor Frank K. Mott, of Oakland, under whose progressive administration the city has more rapidly advanced than during any similar period in its history, has, from the day he assumed office, demonstrated that he possessed a keen appreciation of the value of Oakland's water front, recognizing it as one of the city's chief assets.

After years of litigation the city finally, through court decisions, legislative acts, and favorable compromises, regained control of substantially its entire water front, which had been under railroad control as the result of unfortunate grants made to a private individual by the town of Oakland in the early fifties and later transferred to a railroad corporation. The water-front improvements now under way by Oakland are as follows:

First. The building of a first-class reenforced concrete wharf at the foot of Livingston Street, which is in the vicinity of the California Cotton Mills. This improvement will cost about $175,000.

Second. The building of a quay wall on the estuary extending from Myrtle Street to Broadway, 3,700 feet in length. It is to be built of concrete and equipped with railway tracks, steel warehouse buildings, and machinery for the rapid loading and unloading of vessels. This improvement also consists of dredging between the quay wall and the Government channel to a depth of 30 feet, which will equal the depth of the channel now being dredged by the Government. This work, it is estimated, will cost, with the purchase of some land, about $1,800,000.

Third. The building of a retaining wall across what is known as the Key Route Basin, on the western water front, and the dredging of the area outside thereof and the reclaiming of the land inside the wall. This improvement is to be quite an extensive one, and is already partially provided for in the present appropriation, about $500,000 having been set aside for the commencement of the work. When the new survey of Oakland Harbor is made, as provided for in this bill, I shall cooperate with Mayor Mott in an effort to induce the Government to include the Key Route Basin in the new Oakland Harbor project and share at least a part of the cost of this improvement.

A belt-railway system is also planned to extend around the entire city front, connecting with every railway that enters the city and also with every wharf, with spurs leading to the various manufacturing plants. There are at present over 1,500 factories located in proximity to the water front, which contains 27 miles of shore line.

The city of Alameda, also located upon this harbor, is awakening to its importance, and Mayor W. H. Noy, who never misses an opportunity to advance the city's interests, has appointed a board of harbor commissioners. In the near future this city will undoubtedly improve the water-front property to which the city has title.

The improvement of Oakland Harbor should be pushed as rapidly as possible. Advantageously located on the continental side of San Francisco Bay, where car and ship can meet, the termini of three transcontinental railroads, Oakland has a wonderful future and will fully utilize all her harbor facilities. The day for the opening of the Panama Canal is rapidly approaching. Now that the House has decided that American ships in the coastwise trade shall be granted free tolls, the result of a fight which was started at a meeting of Pacific coast commercial bodies called at my suggestion in San Francisco in October last, and which fight I continued before the House committee and upon the floor, the commercial importance of the canal to every Pacific coast port has increased, and Oakland intends to hold itself in readiness to make the most of its opportunities, for no locality will offer greater facilities to the shipping of the world.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, since becoming a Member of this House my attention has been called with great frequency by those who are owners of a large percentage of the vessels, steamers, and barges engaged in the coastwise trade on the Atlantic coast, and I have been importuned also by masters of these vessels used in the trade and the Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots to obtain, if possible, a deeper and more direct channel across Pollock Rip Shoals and to secure, if possible, a removal of a portion of Stone Horse and Bearse Shoals, in Nantucket Sound, along the southern shore of Cape Cod.

Year after year the United States engineers failed to consider or reported unfavorably upon the project without making an examination of the same. I did not become disheartened, although to meet so many rebuffs from official sources was somewhat discouraging, but in each succeeding Congress I reintroduced and presented bills embodying this improvement, and finally these efforts have been rewarded by the appropriation contained in this bill.

By the active cooperation of the maritime interests of the Atlantic coast and continued presentation of the subject to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors hearings were held and such important facts were developed that the said board recommended that the sum of $250,000 be expended for the purpose of determining whether it would be possible, by placing a steam dredge in Nantucket Sound, to remove the sand bars which from time immemorial have obstructed this great natural water highway of commerce.

A preliminary examination having been made in accordance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, it was revealed that by the action of the numberless steamers and large swift sailing craft a natural channel improving the existing waterway had been produced, and this fact led to the belief that the improvement sought was worthy of further exploitation. At the time the subject was considered by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate (the report from the engineer board not being received at the time the river and harbor bill was considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives), the sum of $250,000 was provided by an amendment to the river and harbor bill as proposed and adopted in the Senate.

Subsequently, owing to the short time to elapse before another river and harbor bill will be presented, it was agreed in conference that not more than $125,000 could be expended the present year, and the amendment reducing the amount to $125,000 has been agreed too. The project has received the hearty indorsement of both branches of Congress, and if the amount provided in the present bill demonstrates the importance of the undertaking and develops the benefits to be derived from the improvement I believe the great maritime interests involved may rest assured that ample provision will be made in the next river and harbor bill for a continuance of the work, and that it will be made a continuing project until the improvement shall be finally consummated. I submit herewith official communications and statements bearing upon the subject, which I believe will be of interest:

[House Document No. 536, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

NANTUCKET SOUND, MASS.

Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports of preliminary examination and survey of Nantucket Sound, Mass.:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 12, 1912.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated 10th instant, together with copies of reports from Lieut. Col. J. C. Sanford, Corps of Engineers, and a special board of engineer officers, dated November 16, 1909, and November 21, 1911, with maps, on preliminary examination and survey, respectively, of Nantucket Sound, Mass., made in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909.

Very respectfully,

H. L. STIMSON, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, February 10, 1912.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for transmission to Congress, reports dated November 16, 1909, by Lieut. Col. J. C. Sanford, Corps of Engineers, and November 21, 1911, with maps, by a special board of engineer officers, on preliminary examination and survey, respectively, prepared in compliance with a provision of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, as follows:

"Nantucket Sound [Mass.], with a view to the removal of the northerly end of Stone Horse Shoal and of such portions of Bearse Shoal and Pollock Rip Shoal as may be necessary."

The improvement desired by navigation interests, and in which much interest has been manifested, and which will be of unusually great value to navigation if secured, is a straight channel not less than 1 mile wide and 30 feet deep at low water from the Handkerchief Light Vessel, about 5¼ miles southwest of Monomoy Lighthouse, extending northeastward to the whistling buoy near the present northern entrance to the Pollock Rip Slough, to replace the present crooked and in places narrow and dangerous Pollock Rip Channel.

Because of the mobile character of the material on the bottom and the exposed location of the channel it has been impracticable to make at this time a reliable estimate of cost of the desired improvement. Noting that one or more Government-owned dredges adapted to this class of work will probably be available within the next year or so, the board suggests the use of such plant in affording relief at dangerous localities, particularly in the vicinity of Shovelful Lightship, where any widening of the channel will be immediately beneficial to commerce. From such a practical test the most advantageous and economical methods of carrying out the work desired, as well as its probable cost, can be more definitely determined. The board recommends for such a test an appropriation of $250,000, and considers that after such work has been done as can be done for that sum the advisability of further work should receive consideration, and that the fact should be made plain in the act of appropriation that the United States is not committed to a continuance of the improvement beyond such test.

These reports have been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to that board's report herewith, dated December 19, 1911, concurring in the views of the special board.

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports I concur in the views of the special board and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore in carrying out the instructions of Congress I report as follows: That the improvement by the United States of the north or Pollock Rip Channel through the shoals lying near the entrance to Nantucket Sound, by the use of an available Government-owned plant under a single cash appropriation of $250,000, is advisable in order to enable a more definite determination to be made as to what amount of additional work of improvement is advisable. It is also considered advisable that the act of appropriation should make clear the fact that this improvement is only in the nature of a test, upon the results of which the extent of improvement justified is to be determined.

The vicinity of the proposed work is shown on Coast and Geodetic Survey Chart No. 111.

Very respectfully,

W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF NANTUCKET SOUND, MASS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Newport, R. I., November 16, 1909.

SIR: In compliance with department instructions dated March 9, 1909, I have the honor to submit the following report on the preliminary examination of the following locality, as required by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909: "Nantucket Sound [Mass.], with a view to the removal of the northerly end of Stone Horse Shoal and of such portions of Bearse Shoal and of Pollock Rip Shoal as may be necessary."

The numerous and extensive shoals lying eastward and southeastward of the eastern entrance to Nantucket Sound and southward and eastward of the southeasterly elbow of Cape Cod, constitute probably the greatest danger to navigation to be found on any of the coastwise routes of the Atlantic coast of the United States north of Hatteras. In view of the numerous vessels passing around these shoals they are probably a greater menace to navigation than Hatteras. Their dangerous character is shown both by the large number of wrecks annually occurring there and by the large number of light vessels and other aids to navigators traversing the shoals.

From Nantucket Sound to the ocean two channels lead through the shoals. The north or Pollock Rip Channel is the most used, as it is shorter, is somewhat protected from easterly storms by the shoals outside it, and is closer to the shore; but it is quite circuitous and narrow in places and the tidal currents are strong and varying in direction. The second or south channel leads through the shoals in a nearly due east direction from Nantucket (Great Point) Lighthouse. It is somewhat deeper than the Pollock Rip Channel and much wider, but is not so direct for coastwise vessels and carries a vessel much farther from the shore. This channel is considered in the United States Coast Pilot for the Atlantic coast as the dividing line between Nantucket and Monomoy Shoals, the shoals lying to the northward of the channel being called the Monomoy Shoals, while those to the southward are called the Nantucket Shoals. The following description of the Monomoy Shoals in general, and of the shoals particularly named in the river and harbor act, with others lying along the course of the proposed improvement, is taken from the above publication:

"Monomoy Shoals consist of numerous detached shoals of a shifting character with 3 to 18 feet over them, extending about 5½ miles in an easterly and 9½ miles in a southerly and south-southeasterly direction from Monomoy Point. Many parts of these shoals, separated from others by narrow sloughs, have special names and are briefly described below.

"Bearse Shoal is the western and Pollock Rip the eastern part of the shoal extending from three-eighths mile to 3¾ miles eastward of Monomoy Lighthouse. These shoals consist of a series of sand shoals and sand ridges, with 4 to 18 feet over them and deep water between them. The northeastern and southeastern extremities of these shoals lie 4 miles and 3¾ miles ENE. ¾ E. and SE. by E. ¾ E., respectively, from Monomoy Point Lighthouse.

"Broken Part of Pollock Rip, with depths of 15 to 18 feet over it, lies eastward of Pollock Rip, and is separated from it by Pollock Rip Slough, which has a width of about one-half mile and depth of 3½ to 6 fathoms.

"Twelve Foot Shoal, southward of the broken part of Pollock Rip, has 14 to 18 feet over it and lies 5½ miles SE. ½ E. from Monomoy Lighthouse.

"Stone Horse Shoal, Little Round Shoal, and Great Round Shoal are portions of a continuous series of sand shoals and sand ridges with depths of 5 to 18 feet over them lying directly eastward of the entrance of Nantucket Sound and between the two main channels. Stone Horse Shoal and Little Round Shoal lie on the south side of the deep-water channel between them and Pollock Rip. Great Round Shoal lies from 6 to 9½ miles in SSE. direction from Monomoy Point Lighthouse; southward and eastward of this shoal for a distance of about 2½ miles there are numerous shoal spots with depths varying from 17 to 18 feet over them.

"Shovelful Shoal, extending three-fourths mile southward from Monomoy Point, is bare in places and rises abruptly from the deep waters of Butlers Hole.

"Handkerchief Shoal is the extensive shoal, with from 3 to 18 feet over it, lying southwestward of Monomoy Point. It is about 4¼ miles long north and south, and its greatest width is about 2 miles. Its southern end, which rises abruptly from a depth of 8 fathoms to 10 feet, is about one-half mile northward of Handkerchief Shoal Light Vessel and 5¼ miles SW. ¾ W. from Monomoy Point Lighthouse, and is marked by a buoy (nun, red, No. 10). Its northern end rising gradually from 3½ fathoms to 15 feet, lies about 3 miles WNW. ½ W. from Monomoy Point Lighthouse, and is marked by a buoy (spar, black, No. 3). On the eastern edge of the shoal are three buoys, which mark the edge of the narrow channel between it and Shovelful Shoal and Monomoy Point."

No previous preliminary examination of this locality with a view to its improvement has ever been made.

What is desired by those interested in the improvement is the replacement of the present north channel by a straight channel extending from the Handkerchief Shoal Light Vessel in an east-northeasterly direction to the northeast whistling buoy, which lies northerly of the present northern entrance to the Pollock Rip Slough Channel, as shown on a small chart issued by the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Volunteer Harbor, No. 4, with printed description and arguments. The width shown on the above-named chart is seven-eighths of a nautical mile, and the depth desired is stated to be not less than 25 feet at mean low water. The present course eastward from the Handkerchief Light Vessel is NE. by E. ½ E. to the Shovelful Shoal Light Vessel about 5 nautical miles; thence ESE. ½ E. to the Pollock Rip Light Vessel about 3¾ miles; thence N. by E. ¾ E. to Pollock Rip Shoal Light Vessel 4¾ miles, passing at a distance of about 2¼ miles the northeast whistling buoy. The angles in the course at the Shovelful Light Vessel and the Pollock Rip Light Vessel are about 56° 15' and 95° 37½', respectively.

The arguments presented for the proposed improvement are many, being based mainly upon the large amount of commerce traversing the locality, the dangers to which this commerce is exposed, and the lessening of these dangers by the proposed channel, and upon the belief that the channel could be dug and maintained at a comparatively small expense, in view of the great improvements made in recent years in dredging on ocean bars, and particularly the small cost per cubic yard of the dredging now being done in the Ambrose Channel, N. Y. Each of these subjects will be examined in turn.

PRESENT AND PROSPECTIVE COMMERCE.

As it is not considered safe for vessels drawing more than about 21 feet to attempt to pass through the north passage, such vessels are now obliged to take the south channel, but Nantucket Sound can not be easily traversed by vessels having a greater draft than 27 feet (see Atlantic Coast Pilot, pt. 3, p. 84), and it is not thought that vessels drawing upward of 25 feet often pass through the sound. For this reason it is believed that with the construction of the proposed channel the present south channel would be very little used. Hence, the statistics of both channels are taken together as indicating the probable amount of use of the proposed channel in case no other artificial channels between Boston and Long Island Sound were constructed.

The Board of Engineers appointed under the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, to make an examination of the relative merits for harbors of refuge for all proposed or available localities on the south and southeast coast of Rhode Island and Massachusetts stated in their report, dated December 2, 1903 (printed in H. Doc. No. 60, 58th Cong., 2d sess.), that—

"The number of vessels following the route through Vineyard and Nantucket Sounds and along the eastern shore of Cape Cod is estimated to be annually upward of 50,000.

"Practically all of this commerce passes Cape Cod."

The number of vessels now passing the Cape, however, is believed to be considerably less than this, though the average tonnage is constantly increasing. Reports of the keepers of the Pollock Rip Shoals Light Vessel, of the Great Round Shoal Light Vessel, and of the Shovelful Shoal Light Vessel, kindly furnished me by Capt. W. G. Cutler, United States Navy, inspector second lighthouse district, indicate that the total number of vessels of all kinds passing the shoals by both passages in the year August 1, 1908, to July 31, 1909, was 22,841, of which 3,638 were steamers, 3,291 tugs, 8,907 sailing vessels, and 7,005 barges. Comparing these figures with the statistics for Boston Harbor for the calendar year 1907, it would appear that a considerable portion of the sailing vessels given are fishing vessels. The arrival and departure of coastwise vessels at Boston in that year (printed in Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1908, pt. 1, p. 958) are as follows:

Class.	Number.	Gross tonnage.	Average tonnage.
Steamers	4,496	9,954,864	2,214
Sailing vessels[1]	2,918	2,432,250	834
Tugs	4,606	1,398,230	304
Barges	7,212	6,737,604	934
Total	19,232	20,522,948	.....

[1] Excluding fishing vessels.

It will be noted from this table that the total number of tugs and barges is about four times that of sailing vessels. Comparing these figures with those of former years, the change in proportion of the different classes of vessels is noteworthy. In 1902 steamers comprised 20.5 per cent; tugs, 18 per cent; sailing vessels, 24 per cent; and barges, 37.5 per cent. In 1906 the steamers comprised 20.3 per cent; tugs, 20.6 per cent; sailing vessels, 15.8 per cent; and barges, 43.3 per cent. The above figures for 1907 show steamers, 23.4 per cent; tugs, 23.9 per cent; sailing vessels, 15.2 per cent; and barges, 37.5 per cent. A comparison of cargo carried by water to Boston in 1899 and 1905, made by Mr. William Barclay Parsons, chief engineer of the Boston, Cape Cod & New York Canal Co., shows that of the total tonnage carried to Boston in 1899, 53.9 per cent went in steamers and exactly the same in 1905; but, while barges carried but 21.1 per cent in 1899, they carried 31.3 per cent in 1905, and the sailing-vessel tonnage, which accounted for 25 per cent of the whole in the first year, had fallen to 14.8 per cent in the second.

The total amount of cargo passing through the shoals can only be approximated. In 1907 it was estimated by Mr. Parsons that it amounted to 12,000,000 tons of coal and 6,000,000 tons of other commodities. During the same year the total receipts of coal at all New England ports north of Cape Cod which were under improvement by the Government, and which included all ports of importance, amounted to 9,812,911 tons (of 2,000 pounds), all of which, it is believed, passed through these shoals. Definite figures as to other commodities do not exist, but it is believed that 6,000,000 tons is a fair estimate.

The future amount of commerce using this route is largely dependent upon the effect of the construction of new artificial routes for the purpose of enabling the passage around Cape Cod to be avoided. One of these, the Cape Cod Ship Canal, is now under construction, and it is expected by the company constructing it that it will be completed in about three years. Another is the proposed inland waterway between Boston and Long Island Sound via Narragansett Bay and an inland route in southern Rhode Island, for which a survey and estimate are ordered by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909. It is the expectation of the Boston, Cape Cod & New York Canal Co. that on the completion of their canal all coastwise steamers, tugs, and barges will use the canal instead of passing around the Cape, and that sailing vessels will also use it under certain weather conditions. This expectation, so far as steam vessels and barges are concerned, appears to be justifiable, provided sufficiently low rates of toll on the canal are fixed. As to sailing vessels, what the effect will be is somewhat problematical. As the canal will shorten the distance between New York and Boston about 67 miles, there is some question whether, on the completion of the canal, sailing vessels will be able to continue their competition in the carrying of coal with tugs and barges, and this will depend largely on whether the tolls are fixed close to the maximum amount that tugs and barges can afford to pay or whether they are made much lower. In any case it is fair to assume that after the completion of the canal the total traffic around Cape Cod will be, in a marked degree, reduced. The effect of the construction of an intracoastal waterway from Boston to New York via Narragansett Bay would be to induce the substitution of lighter barges, more cheaply built and operated, and suited only to inland navigation, for the expensive seagoing barges necessary for navigation around Cape Cod or via the Cape Cod Canal, and the development of the inland route would reduce somewhat proportionately the present coastwise commerce carried on in sailing vessels.

DANGERS TO NAVIGATION.

The dangers to which navigation is exposed in Vineyard and Nantucket Sounds and in passing through the Monomoy Shoals are indicated by the following quotations from the Atlantic Coast Pilot:

"The numerous shoals, strong tidal currents, at certain seasons thick fog, and the large number of sailing vessels there are often encountered beating through the narrow parts of the channel, call for more than the ordinary attention of the navigator. The strongest currents will be encountered in Pollock Rip Slough, between the Handkerchief and Pollock Rip Light Vessels, off East and West Chops, and in Vineyard Sound. In some cases the current sets directly on the shoals and, in a calm, sailing vessels are sometimes obliged to anchor to prevent getting aground."

Statistics as to wrecks which have been removed by the Government give a very good idea as to the dangerous character of the shoals and as to the causes of shipwreck.

Between 1885 and June 30, 1909, 154 wrecks were removed by this office. They consisted of 8 steamers, 2 barkentines, 1 brig, 110 schooners, 19 barges, and 21 unknown. The unknown vessels were large pieces of wreckage forming obstructions, but so far broken up as to have lost their identity. Of the 154 wrecks, 54 were from the Monomoy Shoals (north passage) and are classified as follows: Five steamers, 1 barkentine, 40 schooners, 7 barges, and 1 unknown.

The causes of the 154 wrecks were: Collisions, 35; struck shoals and sank, 19; driven ashore or foundered in gales, 40; burned, 9; unknown causes, 51. The causes of the 54 wrecks on Monomoy Shoals (north passage) were: Collisions, 19; struck shoals and sank, 13; gales, 10; burned, 1; unknown causes, 11.

Between the years 1880 and 1903 there are records in this office of 188 marine disasters on the Monomoy Shoals (north passage), not always, however, resulting in complete loss.

The 188 were: One ship, 2 brigs, 2 barkentines, 169 schooners, 2 sloops, 2 steamships, 1 steam yacht, 2 schooner yachts, 7 barges. Of the 154 wrecks removed, only 1 was in the south passage between Monomoy and Nantucket Shoals.

The length of that portion of the principal sailing route from New York to Boston on or near which the above 154 wrecks were removed is 98⅞ miles, and the length of the north passage through Monomoy Shoals is 13⅜ miles, the latter length being 13½ per cent of the total length. The percentage of wrecks removed in the north passage is, however, 35. Since June 30, 1909, 4 additional wrecks, consisting of 2 schooners and 2 barges, have been removed or reported for removal. The two schooners were wrecked in Vineyard Sound and Nantucket Sound, respectively, due to striking shoals. The two barges were wrecked on Monomoy Shoals, one of these being caused by collision with a steamer and one by striking on a newly formed and unmarked shoal.

The main dangers of passing through the Monomoy Shoals by the present north passage, and which the proposed improvement, it is claimed, would lessen, are due principally to the following, taken in connection with the great number of vessels passing: Narrowness and tortuousness of the channel, fog, tidal currents, adverse winds.

Narrowness and tortuousness of channel.—The present channel from the Handkerchief Shoal Light Vessel to the northeast whistling buoy on the three courses above described varies greatly in the different parts with regard to the width and depth. The narrowest part of the section from the Handkerchief Shoal Light Vessel to the Shovelful Shoal Light Vessel for a depth of 21 feet is about 3,600 feet near its northeastern end, while at the southwestern end there is practically no limit to its width on the southeastern side, the Handkerchief Shoal approaching it closely, however, on the northwestern side. On the course from the Shovelful Shoal Light Vessel to Pollock Rip Light Vessel the minimum width for 21 feet depth is 3,600 feet and the average width about 5,700 feet. For the section through Pollock Rip Slue from Pollock Rip Light Vessel to the northeast whistling buoy the minimum width for 21 feet depth is about 2,000 feet and the average width 3,200 feet. At the northern entrance of Pollock Rip Slue the shoal on the east, known as the broken part of Pollock Rip, has within the past year been found to have advanced in a marked degree westwardly, so that the bell and gas buoys marking the entrance have had to be moved 1,200 feet to the west, thus placing them practically on the sailing course.

The most dangerous points in the sailing course appear to be the turn at the Pollock Rip Light Vessel and the narrow passage through Pollock Rip Slue. So far as straightness is concerned, the proposed channel would be a marked improvement on the present one, largely diminishing the chances of collision in the narrow channels and at the turns.

Fogs.—The statement is made by the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Volunteer Harbor, No. 4, that fogs are more prevalent here than on any other part of our coast. It has been impossible for me to verify this, but I think it may be assumed that fogs here interfere with more vessels than on any other part of our coast. The following statement furnished me by Capt. W. G. Cutler, United States Navy, inspector second lighthouse district, gives the hours of fog for the fiscal years 1906 to 1909 at the Pollock Rip and the Great Round Shoal Light Vessels:

Pollock Rip Light Vessel, No. 47:	Hours.
1906	1,065
1907	1,360
1908	1,236
1909	1,185
Average hours per year	1,211

Great Round Shoal Light Vessel, No. 42:	Hours.
1906	917
1907	1,625
1908	1,378
1909	1,119
Average hours per year	1,259

As to the time of year and direction of wind in which fogs are most frequent in this locality, the Atlantic Coast Pilot says:

"Fogs are liable to occur at any time, but are more frequent from April to October than during the remainder of the year. They come very frequently with the easterly and southerly winds; northerly winds carry them away."

Probably a majority of the disasters on these shoals have occurred during fog. Collisions are generally due to the narrowness of the channel, particularly in Pollock Rip Slue, to the sharpness of the turns, and to the large number of steamers and tows passing through in thick weather.

Were the steamers and tows to cease using this channel, as is expected on the completion of the Cape Cod Canal, the danger to sailing vessels from collision would be reduced to a small part of what it is at present. Under present conditions it would also be greatly reduced if all sailing vessels were to use the main or south passage via the Great Round Shoal Light Vessel, by which the route from New York to Boston is lengthened by only about 12 miles.

Tidal currents: Regarding these the Atlantic Coast Pilot speaks as follows:

"Northward of Pollock Rip the general set of the flood is eastward of northeast and of the ebb a little westward of southwest. The current sets in all directions of the compass during the 12 lunar hours without ever being at rest, turning from north to east and from south to west (with the hands of a watch). About 4 miles is the greatest velocity observed. This was on the rips eastward of Nantucket Island. About 3 hours after the currents turn they attain their greatest velocity."

Eldridge's Tide and Current Book, 1894, states that at Pollock Rip Light Vessel the flood current at the time of its greatest velocity runs from west-southwest to west; the ebb current from east-northeast to east. The force and direction of the current is greatly altered by strong, long-continued winds.

Eldridge's chart gives for a point about one-half mile west by south of the Northeast Whistling Buoy an average velocity for the ebb of 1½ miles and for the flood 1½ miles, which is about the same as given by him in the wider part of Nantucket Sound and is much less than for the narrower portions of Vineyard Sound. The greatest danger due to these currents appears to be from the fact that they vary constantly in direction and frequently tend to set vessels on the shoals. This danger would probably be lessened by the proposed channel, both on account of its direction and width.

COST OF CONSTRUCTING AND MAINTAINING PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT.

Letters and printed matter received indicate a belief on the part of the writers that the proposed channel involves a very small amount of dredging. One of them states that it "gives a working channel with a minimum of dredging; in fact, is almost a natural channel."

The description issued by the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Volunteer Harbor No. 4, contains the following:

"In the proposed channel there is at present a little more than a mile where the depth of water ranges from 14 to 20 feet, the balance being a natural channel, with depths from 4½ to 8 fathoms, obstructed only by the lumps north of Stone Horse Shoal, which at present have a depth of 21 feet."

The above fairly states the present conditions except as to certain depth figures. There is now a natural channel between Pollock Rip Shoal and Bearse Shoal having a least depth of about 3¾ fathoms and a second narrower and shallower channel through Pollock Rip Shoal parallel to it, both being within the limits of the proposed channel. The chart does not give the depths in the second channel mentioned. The least depth on Pollock Rip Shoal within the limits of the proposed channel is given on the chart as 12 feet. The lumps north of Stone Horse Shoal, as shown on the chart, consist of four small lumps and a narrow shoal about one-third of a mile in length, the least depth on the latter, as shown on the chart, being 12 feet. In spite of the fact, however, that much of the proposed channel is, as stated, a natural channel, a very considerable amount of dredging would be required to secure the width and depth desired. No Government hydrographic survey of this locality having been made by the United States Coast and Godetic Survey since 1906 (possibly not since 1902) the latest chart furnishes only a very approximate idea of the amount of dredging that may be required. (For example, the 1900 chart, the latest hydrography on which is of 1899, shows a depth of 14 fathoms. The latest chart, on which corrections to hydrography to 1906 are made, shows a depth at the same point of 28 fathoms. At another point where the 1900 chart shows 4¾ fathoms the latest chart shows 8¾ fathoms.)

On this latest chart the amount of material shown above the 26-foot plane is between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 cubic yards, the few soundings allowing only a very rough calculation to be made. The amount of back fill during the work I should expect to be large. Costly seagoing suction dredges would have to be constructed for this greatly exposed work. The material is believed to be sand only. The above statements are made for the purpose of indicating only that the work can not be done at so low a cost as seems to be believed.

The question as to the possibility of maintaining at a reasonable cost the channel when constructed appears in this case to be of much greater importance than in the usual case. The shoals are undoubtedly of a shifting character. A comparison of Coast Survey charts issued from 1860 to the present time shows enormous changes in the channels and in the shape and position of the various shoals.

On the chart of 1860 the principal passage from Butlers Hole (deep water southwest of Shovelful Shoal Light Vessel) to the ocean was due east from Pollock Rip Light Vessel through a 5-fathom passage south of the broken part of Pollock Rip. The chart of 1874 shows this passage closed by the 5-fathom contour, which is continuous from off Chatham around the entire group of the Monomoy Shoals, the distance between the outside and inside 5-fathom curves being but 600 yards, with a depth of 4¾ fathoms between. The 1885 chart shows this distance to be about 800 yards, with 3¾ fathoms between and with several small shoals carrying less than 3 fathoms in the immediate vicinity. The 1888 chart shows this distance to be about 2,500 yards, with a minimum depth of 3¾ fathoms. The 1894 and 1900 charts give the distance as about 900 yards, with a minimum depth of 3¾ fathoms. The 1908 chart gives the extreme distance between the inside and outside 5-fathom contours as about 3,600 yards, with a minimum depth of 3½ fathoms, but with an intervening hole of 5 fathoms. The position of this easterly passage moved south from its 1860 position, the course from the Pollock Rip Light Vessel changing from due east to about southeast. (This passage is not the main or south passage by the Great Round Shoal Light Vessel.) The minimum depths all occur in the extreme easterly part and appear to be the southerly extension of broken part of Pollock Rip, the shoaling on the inside being much less in depth but extending over a wider area.

On the 1894 chart, along the north side of the deep water extending easterly from Butlers Hole, the 5-fathom curve extends noticeably into these shoals in three arms, which continue through the shoals with lesser depths, forming secondary channels—one close to the shore of Monomoy Island, one almost dividing Bearse Shoal from Pollock Rip Shoal, and one between Pollock Rip Shoal and the broken part of Pollock Rip. The first of these was not shown on the 1860 chart, and the other two were not very prominent; but with the closing of the eastern 5-fathom passage they have increased, until, on the chart of 1900, the passage between Bearse and Pollock Rip Shoals shows a minimum depth of 3¼ fathoms and that between Pollock Rip Shoal and the broken part of Pollock Rip, known as Pollock Rip Slough, carried 4 fathoms, with a distance of only 450 yards between the outside and inside 5-fathom curves. On the 1908 chart this latter passage has shoaled considerably, and shows but two isolated spots exceeding 5 fathoms in depth; it is the passage most used by vessels and is considered safe for 3½ fathoms. As above stated, the broken part of Pollock Rip has recently made out about 1,200 feet to the westward, considerably narrowing the northern entrance.

In 1860 the Shovelful Shoal and Bearse Shoal, as defined by the 18-foot contour, were continuous and separated from Pollock Rip Shoal. In 1874 the first two of these were separated and the last two were joined together, with the southern part of Pollock Rip Shoal broken into a number of smaller shoals, which condition has continued up to the latest chart, but with varying outlines on the successive charts. The Handkerchief Shoal, which is rather more protected from the heaviest waves than the outlying shoals and therefore more nearly continuous in form, had approximately the following areas inclosed within the 18-foot curve (the dates refer to the dates of issue of charts).

	Acres.
1860	1,900
1888	2,660
1894	2,980
1908	3,230

The above shows a continuous increase amounting to 70 per cent in 48 years.

The area of water exceeding 5 fathoms in depth in the eastern extension of Butlers Hole, within which area are stationed the Shovelful Shoal and Pollock Rip Light Vessels, and limited on the west by a line drawn from the northern limit of Stone Horse Shoal to Monomoy Point, is as follows:

	Acres.
1860	3,200
1888	3,000
1894	3,600
1900	3,700
1908	2,670

The measurement of any of the extreme outside shoals would be very unsatisfactory, as these are very much broken up and often indicated as a small circle around a single sounding.

The areas of shoals within the proposed channel on which the depth is less than that proposed are approximately as follows on the various charts:

Date.	Stone Horse Shoal and lumps north of it.	Pollock Rip and Bearse Shoal.	Total.
	Acres.	Acres.	Acres.
1860	192	1,020	1,212
1874	100	840	940
1885	180	840	1,020
1888	210	910	1,120
1894	260	960	1,220
1900	250	940	1,190
1908	280	1,000	1,280

The following is taken from Eldridge's Coast Pilot, 1890:

"Pollock Rip: During the last 40 years the water upon this dangerous shoal has been gradually increasing in depth. In 1832 some part of it was dry at low tide; in 1842 the least depth at low tide upon it was 3 feet; in 1852, 5 feet; in 1862, 6 feet; in 1872, 7 feet; and in August, 1887, 8 feet. From 1 to 1½ miles to the northward of the Pollock Rip, there are at this date (1890) many ridges of sand or broken rips, which are constantly changing in depth and should be avoided by large or heavy draft vessels.

"Broken part of Pollock Rip: During the last 30 years this broken ground has extended seaward about four-tenths of a mile; the surveys that have been made across it from time to time during that period, show changes in the depth of water in the ship channel.

"Ship channel: In 1852, on a direct course E. by S. ¼ S., from Pollock Rip Lightship, not less than 30 feet of water was found in this channel at low tide. In 1862, 24 feet; in 1872, 20 feet; and in August, 1887, 16 feet.

"Northeast Channel (Pollock Rip Slough Channel): The depth in this channel since 1851, has been constantly changing. A careful survey in August, 1887, shows not less than 17 feet on a direct course N. E. ¼ N. from Pollock Rip Lightship."

Also the following:

"The sand ridges on the northern part of Stone Horse Shoal near Shovelfull Lightship are constantly changing in depth."

From the above statements of changes in the shoals, together with the fact that on the edges of the proposed channel the depths would in many places be as small as 10 feet, and considering the great exposure of these shoals to violent storms, with consequent great movements of sand, it is apparent that the maintenance of this channel would almost certainly be very expensive.

BENEFITS TO BE DERIVED FROM PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT.

One of the benefits to be derived from the improvement is a probable reduction in the number of wrecks occurring annually on these shoals, with frequent loss of life. The annual cost to the Government of removing these wrecks has averaged about $3,269. No reliable information as to the diminution in the number of wrecks which would result from the improvement appears possible, though under present conditions there would undoubtedly be a considerable reduction.

The water distance from New York to Boston would be shortened by about 2 miles, this benefit being very slight as compared with the cost.

Considerable correspondence has been had with parties interested in the improvement and with others with a view to determining what reduction in freight and insurance rates could be expected if the improvement were made.

Regarding freight rates, Capt. R. M. Lavender, port warden, port of Boston, states:

"It is my opinion it would not change the freight rates, as these are at present as low as the common carriers can afford to carry coal."

Capt. John C. Silva, past president American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, of Staten Island, says:

"If it is possible to reduce freight rates in any way on earth, it is by negotiating one channel with but one turn in preference to making three turns over uncertain broken ground in the same short limit of space. I feel that by lessening the number of turns to make we would proportionately lessen the danger of running ashore or of collision on a thoroughfare so very important as this."

The American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Volunteer Harbor No. 4, states:

"We do not expect any decrease of freight rates, but we are assured by the insurance people that we can expect a decrease in the insurance rate, as this and Hell Gate are considered the two most dangerous points on the coast for insurance."

The following statement as to freight rates and insurance on coal between New York and Philadelphia as points of shipment and Boston as a point of delivery during the years 1906, 1907, and 1908 has been kindly furnished me by Mr. J. S. W. Holton, president Philadelphia Maritime Exchange:

1908	[1].55	.63

[1] These rates are from what is known as lower ports. From upper ports they would be from 3 to 5 cents less.

Regarding what reduction can be expected in insurance rates, the Boston Insurance Co. states as follows:

"There are no fixed rates of insurance. We make our rates dependent entirely on the different vessels, the time of year, etc., nor could we promise any reduction on account of the improvements, because the coal business has not been running well, and the different underwriters interested in this class of business feel that the rates are now too low. We would be very glad to have the improvements made, and believe they would lessen the dangers; but the question of future rates would depend entirely on the experience of the business."

The Home Insurance Co., of New York, states:

"I have noted with great interest your remarks, and regret very much that it does not seem possible that any definite answer, such as you would wish to have, can be made to your inquiry. Our company is not engaged in the insurance of sail vessels or their cargoes, but we are interested in other kinds of coastwise shipping. We, with all other underwriters, recognize the dangers of Pollock Rip Shoal and Stone Horse Shoal, and in 20 years' experience I can recall losses owing to these perils aggregating without doubt, I should judge, several hundreds of thousands of dollars, in many of which this company has suffered; but I do not see how it is possible to calculate what percentage of the rate paid for the insurance of a coastwise vessel or her cargo can be directly chargeable to these particularly hazardous locations.

"You will understand that the rates on the various classes of coastwise vessels vary very materially in accordance with the class of vessel, her age, trade, etc. For instance, on an iron or steel tug, with privilege of the north Atlantic coast, the rates would vary from 4 to 7 per cent per annum, based on the age and condition of the vessel. In the case of an ocean barge the rates vary from 5 to 12 per cent, according to age, construction, and route. The rates on coastwise steamships vary from 3 to 8 per cent. All these classes of vessels are customarily insured under an annual policy, the rate paid being for the average for an entire year, and the rates are theoretically based on the outcome of the business for a series of years, modified by competitive conditions, so that it does not seem at all possible to say how much of the rate is chargeable to a specific location or hazard.

"The proposed work in the locality referred to would undoubtedly be of immense value to coastwise shipping; and as every improvement in the conditions of navigation on our coast has been sooner or later followed by a reduction of the insurance premiums on vessels exposed to the hazard in question, it is reasonable to suppose that the improvement of the location would lead very quickly to a reduction of insurance premiums on vessels trading in the waters affected.

"I regret that I can not give you a more specific answer to your requirement; but, in my opinion, to attempt to estimate in advance a reduction, based on the improvement in question, would be at best a vague conjecture."

The Providence-Washington Insurance Co., of Providence, R. I., states:

"Any improvements in navigable waters which tend to reduce losses necessarily reduce marine-insurance rates. The competition is intense, and the business is done very close to cost; sometimes below.

"In this case the rates might possibly be reduced slightly as soon as the improvements were made; but when the companies found that their losses were materially reduced in consequence of the change, heavier reductions in rates would necessarily follow."

Messrs. Johnson & Higgins, of New York, make the following statement:

"We are unable to answer your question as to what effect this will have on marine insurance, as we do not make the rates, being only brokers. It seems to us that your inquiry should be addressed to underwriters, who alone would be capable of making a definite reply. Incidentally, we might say that we do not believe the removal of this shoal will affect the rates of insurance. These rates are based upon the character of vessels employed and the results shown over several years of experience. We do not know what proportion of wrecks has occurred on Stone Horse Shoal; but we are certain that there are many other dangerous points on the route between New York and Boston and Chesapeake Bay points and Boston which will continue a menace to navigation, and will necessitate the gauging of insurance rates accordingly."

CONCLUSIONS.

The great importance of the coastwise trade between New England and the Middle and Southern States around Cape Cod, were the commerce to remain as it now stands or to increase, would seem to justify a considerable expenditure by the Government on any feasible plan toward reducing the great annual loss of property and life due to the dangers of Monomoy Shoals. As stated above, however, it is believed that the dangers due to the present large commerce, and particularly the danger of collision with steamers and long tows, will be very greatly reduced upon the completion of the Cape Cod Canal, though the exact effect of the construction of this canal is not yet known. Further change in the present conditions of water commerce may be expected if an inland water route between Boston and Beaufort, N. C., is later provided. The proposed channel would be costly of construction. The cost of maintaining it would be undoubtedly large and might be so great as to be impracticable. The question as to whether or not the Government should attempt by dredging to improve the passage through these shoals, either by the proposed channel or in any other way, ought, in my opinion, to await the developments due to the completion of the Cape Cod Canal at least.

It is my opinion, therefore, that this locality, as described in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, is not worthy of improvement by the General Government at the present time.

None of the special subjects of inquiry mentioned in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, in connection with the matter of preliminary examinations appear to apply to this case.

Very respectfully,

J. C. SANFORD,
Lieutenant Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY
(Through the Division Engineer).

[First indorsement.]

NORTHEAST DIVISION, ENGINEER OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 19, 1909.

Respectfully forwarded to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The locality in question is not worthy of improvement by the General Government. It is characterized by shifting shoals, and any artificial channel dredged through these would be unstable, and hence misleading.

While the record of marine disasters on the Monomoy Shoals (north passage) is large, like disasters in the south passage seem decidedly infrequent.

It is thought relief from the danger of rounding Cape Cod would more certainly follow using the somewhat longer course around and outside of Great Round Shoal than attempting to maintain a precarious artificial channel through the Monomoy Shoals.

BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1910.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The preliminary examination of Nantucket Sound reported upon within was ordered with a view to the removal of the northerly end of Stone Horse Shoal and of such portions of Bearse Shoal and of Pollock Rip Shoal as may be necessary. After a description of the existing channels in this locality, the present and prospective commerce involved in their navigation, and other related subjects, the district officer reaches the conclusion that the proposed channel will be costly of construction and of maintenance and that the benefits to be expected from the work will not justify the expenditure required to accomplish the proposed improvement. In this opinion the division engineer concurs.

Interested parties having been invited by the district officer to submit their views to the board, Capt. Spinny, representing the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, came before the board at its meeting of December 7, 1909. From observations covering a period of 20 years, he stated that the tidal currents appear to follow the line of improvement now desired and that, while the shoals in the vicinity of the channel now followed have been more or less shifting, the general thread of the channel has remained comparatively stationary, from which observations he, in common with navigation interests in general, believes that the maintenance of a straight channel as indicated on the map (not printed) submitted by him and forwarded herewith would be a matter of small cost.

As to the correctness of these views the board expresses no opinion. From the statements made and from other information before it, however, the board is of the opinion that the commercial and navigation interests utilizing this channel are of sufficient importance to render it advisable to have more precise information as to tidal currents and as to the cost of constructing and maintaining an improved channel through these shoals than is now available, particularly as the advisability of undertaking the work is dependent largely upon the cost of providing the desired channel and upon the stability of such a channel if constructed. It is therefore recommended that the district officer be authorized to make the necessary surveys to investigate these questions and determine, so far as practicable, the direction of tidal currents, etc., and in connection with his further report it is recommended that he also submit an estimate of cost of the work involved.

It is realized that in order to secure full data regarding the above it may be necessary to extend observations over a considerable period of time.

For the board:

WM. T. ROSSELL,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Senior Member of the Board.

SURVEY OF NANTUCKET SOUND, MASS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Newport, R. I., November 21, 1911.

SIR: The board of officers constituted by Special Orders, No. 21, office of the Chief of Engineers, August 28, 1911, to consider and report on survey of Nantucket Sound, has the honor to submit the following report:

Upon call of the senior member the board met at the United States engineer office, Newport, R. I., on Tuesday, October 17, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m. The reports, maps, and other data pertaining to the subject were examined, and on the 18th a duly advertised public hearing was held at the same place. A stenographic report of this hearing is appended. After discussion the board adjourned pending the preparation of a draft of its report. It met again on November 21, when the draft was considered and, with some modifications, was adopted. The full board was present at all meetings and at the hearing.

The provision for examination and survey of the locality as contained in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909, is as follows:

"Nantucket Sound [Mass.], with a view to the removal of the northerly end of Stone Horse Shoal and of such portions of Bearse Shoal and Pollock Rip Shoal as may be necessary."

The duty of making the preliminary examination under this provision was assigned to Lieut. Col. J. C. Sanford, Corps of Engineers, then in charge of the Newport, R. I., engineer district. His report of November 16, 1909, gives a detailed description of the locality and of the difficulties and dangers of navigation in the general vicinity, with general data relative to winds, seas, and currents, and statistics of commerce. Lieut. Col. Sanford describes the nature of the improvement desired, considers in a general way the cost of making and maintaining the proposed improved channel, and concludes that the locality is not worthy of improvement by the General Government at the present time, on account of the cost of the work, uncertainties of the results, and probability that the difficulties it is sought to remedy will be ameliorated by the completion of the Cape Cod Canal, as well as on account of changes in the conditions of water commerce that may result if the proposed inland water route between Boston and Beaufort, N. C., is later provided. The division engineer, Col. J. G. D. Knight, Corps of Engineers, in indorsement of November 19, 1909, concurred in the view that the proposed improvement was not advisable.

The above report was reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in connection with subsequent representations by persons in favor of the improvement. In an indorsement of January 3, 1910, that board expressed the view that the interests concerned were sufficient to warrant obtaining more detailed and definite information regarding the local conditions and probable cost of the improvement. Additional surveys, observations, and estimates were made under instructions from the Chief of Engineers, and the results have been carefully studied by the board.

The improvement desired by the navigation interests is the creation by dredging of a straight channel not less than seven-eighths nautical mile (1 statute mile) wide and 30 feet deep at low water, from the Handkerchief Light Vessel, about 5½ miles southwest of Monomoy Lighthouse, extending northeastward to the whistling buoy near the present northern entrance to the Pollock Rip Slough. A very large commerce of over 20,000,000 tons annually will be benefited greatly if it be practicable to construct and maintain such a channel. The dangers and difficulties encountered in navigating the present crooked, and in places narrow, channel through the shoals and the benefits to be anticipated from the creation of a broad and straight 30-foot channel in place thereof are well stated in the appended report of the hearing of October 18, 1911. The only opposition to the creation of the proposed channel, so far as the board has learned, has come from persons interested in the success of the Cape Cod Canal, now under construction. They assert that the proposed straight channel through the shoals will be unnecessary after that canal is opened, and that the Government would do better to appropriate money for breakwaters to protect the northern entrance to the Cape Cod Canal than to expend funds for dredging the proposed straight channel. The question of such a breakwater is not before the board. The statement that even after the Cape Cod Canal is opened a large commerce would continue to use the outside route through the Pollock Rip Slough was repeatedly made at the hearing.

The appended estimates of quantities to be dredged and other data have been compiled in compliance with the request of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. In a general way they indicate that dredging and maintenance of the proposed channel may be practicable, but the successive surveys available for comparison were made at too long intervals to afford data on which to base reliable conclusions and estimates of cost.

In 1860, 1874, and 1885 the channel is shown extending in an easterly direction from the Pollock Rip Light Vessel, though there was also a northerly channel from this light vessel in 1874 and in 1885. In 1895 and 1908 a northerly channel is the only one shown. There were also various changes between the Pollock Rip Light Vessel and the one near the southern portion of the Handkerchief Shoal during the period covered by the charts, and corresponding changes in the sailing courses and the light vessels marking them. It will be noted, however, that during the period covered by the several published charts referred to a clear channel or passage with over 30 feet depth at low water has existed in a fairly permanent position, extending westward and southwestward from the mean position of the Pollock Rip Light Vessel to that of the Handkerchief Light Vessel, and the general total width of the passage has remained a mile or more, except at the turn in the vicinity of the Shovelful Light Vessel, where the width of channel 30 feet deep and over at mean low tide has been about one-third of a mile. The distance in a northeast direction from deep water south of Bearse Shoal to deep water beyond Pollock Rip has not been more than about 2 miles at any one time, and the line of the shortest course across this shoal portion of the proposed channel has not undergone very radical changes in direction or position, although it has been far from constant in these respects. Especial attention is invited to the comparative chart on which is shown the number of cubic yards of cut and fill in the area covered by the proposed channel found by dividing that area into squares one-third of a mile on a side, and computing the mean depth in each square at the time of each survey.

The available information regarding the material of which the shoals are formed is to the effect that they are largely composed of sand of a character to be easily handled by a suction dredge, but at the hearing on October 18 the view was expressed by one of the speakers that in places below the depth of 6 or 7 fathoms there is hard mud or clay under the sand. It was also stated that rock or bowlders were to be found on Stone Horse Shoal. The narrow and deep channel that has been maintained in the vicinity of the Shovelful Lightship indicates that possibly in that locality the shoals contain harder material than sand. The possibility of clay and bowlders forming part of some of the shoals is indicated by the general characteristics of some of the islands and portions of the mainland of southeastern New England. The exposed location has so far prevented a definite determination of the nature of the material that will have to be dredged to form the proposed channel by borings or otherwise, but the fact that at times the surveys have shown 30 feet or more of water where the depths are now much less indicates that a large part of the yardage to be removed is mobile in character, and hence is probably sand.

Consideration of the above conditions in connection with the other data available leads to the conclusion that the practicability of dredging and maintaining the proposed channel can be determined only by trial on a large scale. The great volume of commerce concerned, certainly over 20,000,000 tons per annum, and the prospects for at least partial success are such as to warrant an expenditure by the General Government for such an attempt. Any widening of the available channel in the vicinity of Shovelful Shoal Lightship by dredging the northern portions of Stone Horse Shoal would be immediately beneficial to commerce, as it would give more sea room at this dangerous turn and would greatly reduce the dangers of collision; this could undoubtedly be secured while the dredging of the complete straight channel was in progress, even if the entire straight channel could not be completed. A much narrower channel through the Pollock Rip near Bearse Shoal than the one proposed could be utilized to advantage by steam vessels under favorable conditions, and the successful creation of such a narrow channel would afford a practical test of the question whether the wider channel could be maintained at reasonable cost by dredging, assisted by the scouring action of the currents.

The United States owns a number of seagoing dredges adapted to this general class of work, and the board has been informed that other works on which they are engaged are now in such shape that one or more of these dredges may be available within the year for practical tests on the Pollock Rip Shoals and vicinity. Such tests, besides producing results immediately beneficial to navigation, would develop beyond conjecture the nature of the material to be handled, the cost of its removal, and whether any changes in the existing types of seagoing dredges are needed for economical and effective work at this locality. If the results so attained should warrant undertaking the dredging of a complete channel, as suggested by those interested in the improvement, the most advantageous and economical methods of carrying out the work, and its cost, would be more definitely known than at present.

We therefore recommend that an appropriation of $250,000 be made for improving the channel through the shoals at the eastern approach to Nantucket Sound in general accordance with this report, the wording of the act to be such as to make it plain that the United States is not committed to the continuance of the improvement beyond the $250,000. After the work has been carried forward to that extent, the advisability of further work should receive consideration

Respectfully submitted.

Colonel, Corps of Engineers.
JOHN MILLIS,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers.
EDW. BURR,
Lieutenant Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

[Second indorsement.]

THE BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
Washington, December 19, 1911.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

This is a report upon survey of Nantucket Sound with a view to improvement in the vicinity of Pollock Rip Shoals, submitted by a special board to whom was assigned the duty of making this investigation. It appears that much interest has been manifested in this improvement, which indicates its importance and its bearing upon general commerce and navigation. The special board states that the improvement desired by navigation interests is a channel not less than 1 mile in width and 30 feet in depth at low water from the Handkerchief Light Vessel about 5½ miles southwest of Monomoy Lighthouse, extending northeastward to the whistling buoy near the present northern entrance to the Pollock Rip Slue, to replace the present crooked and in places narrow channel.

A study of the charts of this locality indicates that the present channel of about 30 feet minimum depth through these shoals has existed for a number of years, but has undergone decided changes in its location, indicating the mobile character of the material on the bottom. The special board finds it impossible to make a reliable estimate of the cost of dredging and maintaining a channel of the dimensions desired by the navigation interests, and concludes that the practicability of the work can be determined only by trial on a large scale. It calls attention to the fact that the United States owns a number of seagoing dredges adapted to this class of work, and that one or more dredges of this type will probably be available within a year for such a test. The prosecution of the work along these lines would produce immediate benefits to navigation, and would definitely determine the nature of the material to be handled, the cost of its removal, and the suitability of these dredges for work of this character. Believing the locality worthy of such a test, the special board recommends an appropriation of $250,000 for this purpose, and stated that the authorization of this trial should not bind the United States to continue the improvement beyond the appropriation recommended at the present time, the advisability of further work to be determined after the results of the test now proposed are made known.

The question of a safe and adequate channel in this vicinity is a very important one to navigation interests. The course suggested by the special board is conservative, comparatively inexpensive, and should determine much more definitely than is now possible the feasibility and desirability of attempting the full improvement desired. This board therefore concurs in the general findings of the special board, and recommends an appropriation of $250,000 for the work proposed. The total amount should be made available in one appropriation. In this case there are no questions of terminal facilities, water power, or other related subjects that have any bearing upon the improvement proposed.

For the board:

WM. T. ROSSELL,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Senior Member of the Board.

OCTOBER 18, 1911—11.10 A. M.

Col. ABBOT. The meeting will please come to order. By Special Orders, No. 21, War Department, Office of the Chief of Engineers, Washington, August 28, 1911, a board consisting of Col. Frederic V. Abbot, Col. John Millis, and Lieut. Col. Edward Burr, Corps of Engineers, was appointed to consider and report on the survey of Nantucket Sound, with a view to the removal of the northerly end of Stone Horse Shoal and of such portions of Bearse Shoal and Pollock Rip Shoal as may be necessary, provided for in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909. The board was authorized to hold a public hearing, which has just been called to order. The board has before it the technical data necessary to answer the questions of how and where and as to cost. We have asked you gentlemen to come here so that we can learn from you the needs for such a channel, the best figures we can obtain as to how much commerce will use it, how much is passing through there now, and as to the dangers of the present conditions, and any other facts bearing upon the economical side of this question. There is a technical side and an economical side. We have the data for the technical side.

I shall ask Mr. William C. Brewer, of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, to present his matter first, as I know he desires to go to New London by one of the early trains.

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM C. BREWER, OF THE BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. BREWER. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. First I will say that about the 4th of October the committee on maritime affairs of the Boston Chamber of Commerce received a communication from you to the effect that this matter was under consideration. As soon as was possible the committee sent out notifications to the various maritime interests of Boston, including the ship-owning and the shipbuilding interests, the navigation interests, and the marine underwriters. The earliest possible date at which it was convenient to have a general meeting was yesterday morning. The committee met and before them appeared an unusually large representation of the marine interests. It was the largest representation, I think, in the history of the Boston Chamber of Commerce in such a matter. I merely mention this as showing the interest taken in the project. There was submitted a plan showing the general direction of the channel. In a brief way it was stated about what the cost would be. The testimony then given by shipowners and by masters generally showed the great need for this improvement, great emphasis being laid on the tortuous and dangerous nature of the passage at the present time and the very great need of straightening it. Details were entered into at considerable length showing the use such a channel would be to navigation, how it would facilitate the passage of shipping over the shoals which is now held up by inclement weather at both ends. Everybody there had a chance to speak. Capt. Crowley will speak later as to these details, he being my associate here from the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and will go more into the details. Coastwise shipping companies were represented, most of the marine underwriters, some of the steamship owners, and some of the sailing-vessel owners. There were also presented a number of letters from masters of coastwise steamers, and all testimony given was entirely in favor of this project. There was no dissenting note from anybody. The committee was most anxious to have it go through, and endeavored to find out more definitely what would be the cost of the project, but no figures were submitted by anybody. After the meeting—and this in particular is my duty here—the committee passed a vote unanimously favoring the project.

In order to present this matter to you as effectively as possible and to show the interest taken in the matter by the chamber of commerce, they then passed a vote that the president be asked to appoint a committee to be present at this hearing, and the president appointed myself and Capt. John G. Crowley for that purpose.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. JOHN G. CROWLEY.

Capt. CROWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was appointed one of the committee to come here. I represent the Boston Chamber of Commerce and also the Coastwise Transportation Co., which has 21,000 tonnage of steamers and 32,000 tonnage of sailing vessels.

Being a master mariner myself and having traveled over Nantucket Shoals as long as any man here, from boyhood, and coming here to speak of this channel, I wish to say that I think this is one of the greatest schemes ever put before the public, as it makes a straight course from the Handkerchief Lightship out to the open sea, and vice versa. We have to make this angle here [indicating on chart], go out to Great Round Shoal and make another turn, encountering the cross currents both ways. If this channel were provided, we would have a straight course through there. Sailing vessels coming down from Boston have to anchor in the channel, it being impossible to come up here [indicating]. We do not have proper anchorage. The Calvin Olcott came down here and could not make the angle and had to anchor off there [indicating]. She parted her chains in the storm and was driven ashore, the crew being lost, the life-savers being unable to reach them. Coming from the westward, it is almost impossible in a northwest gale to come down here with a sailing vessel. We have to stop at the Handkerchief; therefore the vessels are late in returning to Boston. With this channel, as proposed, a vessel could come right down on a straight course. This channel through there, with a very small expenditure of money, will give a straight channel—something that is needed more than anything else that I know of at the present time by coastwise and foreign vessels.

Col. ABBOT. What depth is needed, in your opinion as an expert navigator, for this proposed channel to accommodate the deepest draft traffic likely to use it?

Capt. CROWLEY. At the present time, 30 feet. Our largest steamer draws, loaded, about 26 feet.

Col. ABBOT. Is there any place along the route from Long Island Sound to Boston where there is a less depth than 30 feet of practicable navigable width?

Capt. CROWLEY. No, sir.

Col. ABBOT. Any in Nantucket Sound?

Capt. CROWLEY. No, sir.

Col. ABBOT. And by the Cross Rip Lightship you can use 30 feet?

Capt. CROWLEY. Yes; we have to make a sharp turn there. There are one or two points almost east of the lightship also.

Col. ABBOT. That is also a dangerous location?

Capt. CROWLEY. Yes, sir.

Col. ABBOT. How is the exposure there? Is it as dangerous as at Monomoy?

Capt. CROWLEY. No, sir; it is less dangerous.

Col. ABBOT. Why?

Capt. CROWLEY. Because if a vessel starts to go across there she can be held off.

Col. ABBOT. And is that a good reason why you do not need more than 30 feet, as it is narrow at Cross Rip?

Capt. CROWLEY. Yes, sir.

Col. ABBOT. We want to know what you need in depth in order to develop all the benefit we can with this one improvement.

Capt. CROWLEY. Thirty feet is all that is required.

Col. ABBOT. Now, I would be glad to hear anybody else on this same side.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. R. M. LAVENDER, PRESIDENT PILOTS' ASSOCIATION OF BOSTON.

Capt. LAVENDER. Having from my boyhood days navigated Nantucket Shoals, and knowing the conditions that existed there in those days with lighter draft vessels, and also knowing that in later years the channel has grown deeper, and taking into consideration the conditions now, it has been demonstrated, I think, that this channel can easily be kept clear by a little dredging work. It has deepened from 12 to 20 feet now by the constant use of it by steamers. I can vouch for all that Capt. Crowley has said. We know the conditions as they existed and as they exist to-day, and we believe in the project.

STATEMENT OF MR. L. A. SPINNEY.

Mr. SPINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I was sent here as a member of the Pilots' Association and I also appear as a delegate from the Boston Marine Society. I believe that the first record of any active interest in this project was made by the Boston Marine Society; and I have deposited on the stenographer's desk a record of the action taken by that society.

(Submits paper, marked "Exhibit No. 5," copy appended.)

The society is composed of the marine men, including nearly all the men engaged in Boston and Massachusetts in maritime work, going back to the old ships and coming up to the present large steamers. In the year 1908 this project was brought up in the society during the middle of the year. At the November meeting a petition was circulated and by vote of the society the petition was sent to Congressman GREENE, with a request asking him to take the matter in hand. That year, through Congressman GREENE'S advice, the matter was taken up in Washington, and in 1909 an appropriation was secured for this survey. The matter was returned through the department to Col. Sanford. Going by the old surveys, from which the present charts were made, the colonel found several reasons why he did not think the matter was properly to be carried on at this time, due to the expense and other things. The department at Washington gave us a hearing on December 7. At that time the representatives presented their ideas and the matter was returned to the department with orders to prosecute the survey, which was made in August and December of last year. I wish we could have the technical information you have to use, because I believe it would be to our interests. You hear things about there being some opposition to this channel, but you can not quote anyone. I believe the information you have would be to our interest. The water must have been deeper up there than the charts show or else you would have broken water there; there would be a ripple instead of being smooth. I understand a man walked across there in the year 1850. With the tide running three hours out of every six in this channel it has removed a great deal of the sand. It must be much deeper there than the charts show or we would have broken water there. Your survey gives you the exact information.

Col. BURR. Which shoal are you speaking of now?

Mr. SPINNEY. Of Bearse Shoal and Pollock Rip Shoal. There was 12 feet of water there; now there are 25 feet. The volume of sand to be removed was estimated at 15,000,000 cubic yards. I understand from the survey that there is not much more than half of that there now. It seems that time has removed in 20 years a large body of sand That body of sand has been over one-third removed. The tide in that time would remove a sufficient amount of sand to entirely close up the channel if there was any disposition to close it. The tide which cuts this channel may be depended upon to keep it clear to a width of seven-eighths of a mile. The present channel is three-eighths of a mile wide. The strength of the tide runs three hours east-northeast and the other three hours in the alternate direction. When the tide changes it commences to slow up. This great body of sand would close up the channel if it had not tended to make deeper water by some force. They are using the same old channel as formerly, only it is carrying 25 feet of water instead of 12 feet. The increased draft of vessels has brought about a change in the bottom. Your chart shows a change of 4 fathoms, necessitating the moving of the buoy last year. Vessels of 22 or 23 feet draft struck on this slue. The vessels using the channel to-day go in the old channel, disregarding the way in which the buoy has been removed by the Azalea, I believe. What information was obtained was obtained in one period of slack water, and the information so gained in that 20 or 30 minutes led to the change of the buoy.

The old channel southwest of the Pollock Rip Lightship is still used. The sand has not moved out from the broken part to where the buoy is now; it is the old 4-fathom lump. The department has never removed a single wreck from this locality. There are hundreds of them there. They have been blown up by dynamite, and sand collects around the wreckage. If you will build a jetty by dumping a shipload of stone, it is reasonable to suppose that if you blow up a wreck with dynamite, when the wreckage rests you will collect some sand. The only lumps you will find there are formed by wreckage. The shoals are not changing except so far as this tide has forced its way through the shoals. There are 6 fathoms of water there now where there was but 3. The tide is bound to cut it out. In 20 years it would make its own channel. There is more traffic through that channel, so far as we can estimate, than almost any other. We have arrived at the conclusion, which I believe will be backed up by the figures, that there is more traffic through there than in any other place, except the port of New York, and even that exceeds only in tonnage; I question if it does in the number of vessels. The channel should extend west-southwest; now we have to go west-northwest, which is very difficult for sailing vessels. We should also look at this question from the humanitarian side. No matter what other relief you may provide, if you provide a canal it must be provided for by tolls. Only a certain class of traffic can use it anyway.

There always has been and there always will be a large class of vessels, sailing vessels, which will use the Pollock Rip Shoals Channel, whether you improve it or not; and you will continue to have loss of life and of property if you do not improve it. I think it would cost less to do this work than it costs the underwriters to pay the expenses of losses. I remember the day when the Dimmock and the Hall collided. The Hall was a total loss. The Biscayan collided with the Goodenow, and two other vessels were sunk, on March 12, 1908. The underwriters paid for that day more money than it would cost to construct this channel. This channel when dredged will be largely maintained by nature; otherwise the present channel would have been filled up and closed. I do not think there is any question of maintenance. The law which creates the present channel will maintain it. Sailing vessels will use that channel, particularly in the winter time, when any other relief would be closed by the location and geography of the place. Every winter vessels must round the cape to Provincetown, or go to destruction. That being the condition, aside from any other question at all, the channel should be provided for their protection from any gale that may come. If that was the only consideration, the argument would be well made for this improvement. The dangers are not so much from the stranding of a vessel as from collision. A tug with barges meets a tow coming down from the Shovelful. It has to make a sharp turn in there and you have collisions there. With this channel once straightened, the tide will keep it straight, and, I believe, will keep it deep. We could then keep one side of the lightship, and the great danger will have been removed in the minds of those using the channel. The eastern approach is what gives us the trouble.

Col. ABBOT. That is Bearse Shoal?

Mr. SPINNEY. Yes; Bearse Shoal.

The natural action of the tide has removed from one-half to two-thirds of the sand since the former survey. If we are saving every year the lives and property of the men who use the channel, that alone would be worth the constructing of the channel. One of the reasons formerly advanced against this channel was that there was no depot available for supplies. Now, Nantucket Harbor is being improved and supplies can be obtained there. The only other relief is the relief suggested by going through the canal, the Cape Cod Canal, and that involves extra expense, because it is a commercial proposition and must earn money to make it pay. The present rates of freight are so low that they do not allow vessels to pay tolls. This channel will always be used. On the petition for this improvement you will find every underwriter of importance, every insurance company of importance, every steamship company in New England of any importance—in fact, everyone who is called upon to use the channel. The Boston Marine Society, whose record I have handed in, has in its membership the chief interests involved. From all that class of people this improvement has their earnest support. If anyone would like to ask any questions, I will try to answer them.

Col. BURR. What are the freight rates at present?

Mr. SPINNEY. On coal, 60 to 75 cents a ton.

Col. BURR. From where?

Mr. SPINNEY. From Newport News and Chesapeake Bay points to Boston. I have been told by a representative of one of the steamship companies that the minimum rate of tolls through the Cape Cod Canal would be 10 cents a ton. They could not pay that. They are running so close now to the margin of profit and loss that they could not pay 10 cents a ton in tolls for going through the canal.

STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN M. BLANKENSHIP.

Mr. BLANKENSHIP. I represent the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co., which operates a line of steamships from Jacksonville, Fla., into Boston. We have 936 sailings every year over the shoals—over two and one-half times a day. I do not hesitate to say that there is no improvement which could possibly be made on any ground we cover as important as this one. Any delay we have can always be counted as being on the shoals. You know what delays mean to the shipping interests and what they mean to us. I think that channel is what is needed. From what I have read of the subject, it seems that all that is needed is simply to start it. Get an appropriation for a dredge, such as are used on the Savannah River, and start this channel. Nature will keep it going. Our company wishes to go on record as strongly favoring this channel. We have here to-day Capt. Miles Hillary, who will go into this matter more in detail as to the navigating part of it.

Col. ABBOT. Will you file the names and drafts of all your steamships using this route?

Mr. BLANKENSHIP. Yes, sir. We handle 1,000,000 tons of freight a year. I hope it will be twice as big in two or three years.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. MILES HILLARY.

Capt. HILLARY. I will try to give the practical experience of those who use the channel. For instance, leaving Boston in a fog, we can come down here to Chatham without difficulty. The tide is fair. The wind is blowing. We are a little anxious now regarding going across the shoals for fear of collisions. Here the vessels anchor in the course of vessels at such places as the Slough, or around on the other side of Pollock Rip Shoal. We may meet one, two, or three tows, coming or going, with hawsers from one-half to three-fourths of a mile long. One time I had a cargo worth $600,000. The ship was worth $300,000, and I had on board 100 passengers. I laid there waiting for daylight, as I did not care to take a chance of going through for fear of meeting tows in the channel. I had to wait there 12 hours. My passengers were urging me to go on. They were saying, "I am losing my train," "This is the last time I will come on this line," "Do not wait till daylight." Finally I said, "Well, I will start." I heard the bell and looked and saw I had just missed the bow of a tug. I must go full speed through there because of the cross currents of the tide. Perhaps the sound of the bells may be in a zone where I do not hear. I go on and make my turn on the clock. I have been in the towboat business myself. They usually have very skillful men on the towboats. I cleared the turn and then heard another whistle. I do not know which way to go. There are often times when we do not hear. In that way we make our time up to the Shovelful, and so on through the shoal. It is the constant fear that troubles me. I must go full speed again because I am crossing the tide again. We finally arrive at the Handkerchief, where you are relieved. You have fair conditions there.

I have made the trip through there for 10 years nearly, without missing one trip, except one day when I was sick, carrying passengers and freight. I have had these experiences many times. We have here to-day the captain of the Yale, and he can verify my statements. I will further show the conditions there. Suppose, now, we are going from the west to Boston. We make the Handkerchief all right. We may have lost 10 hours waiting for the fog to lift. I am afraid of meeting tows more than I am off the shoals. I run along up to there [indicating] without stopping. My running time is 20 minutes. I run 18 minutes and hear nothing. I can not run one minute beyond the Shovelful. If I do, I am on the beach. I am afraid. I must judge as to what to do. I have had this experience many times. Afterwards I hear the lightship ringing. Her bell has been in a zone where I could not hear it. If I meet tows, I have to stop, of course. I had to get around there the best way I could. It is a case of another ring, full speed, and I go across that damned Slough, which everybody dreads. We are both cutting off here [indicating]. This is a condition which might occur every day with these fogs. You do not know where your heart is; you say: Your heart is in your mouth. I wish you could see where mine was. I was master of the Orion at this time, and was waiting for the sea to go down some. It went down and I started to go ahead and make my turn, and just then I saw a tow and another steamer. The tow and her barges were running wild, and so was the steamer. I had to take a chance and start my wheel and turn between that steamer and Pollock Rip Lightship. I lost my bridge and my pilot house. My mate, who was a Norwegian, said "Jesus, Captain, we are going to eat sand." I could relate these experiences all day, because I have been crossing through there for 20 years.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. N. L. CULLIN.

Capt. CULLIN. I represent the marine departments of the trunk lines carrying 95 per cent of the tonnage of coal coming east. The companies which I represent, which are the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, the Erie, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, the Lehigh Valley, the New Jersey Central, and the Baltimore & Ohio, operate 23 tugs and 164 barges. Their business is entirely with the eastern ports. We go over these shoals 1,950 times a year; that is the record for the year 1910, closing June 30. We carried during that time 2,698,000 tons of coal over the shoals. We take three barges in tow. If we go loaded, we must come back light, so we simply double up our tows going both ways. The Reading Railroad alone ships from 140,000 to 170,000 tons of coal a month over these shoals. That is about 80 per cent of the coal taken into the eastern ports. I will not dwell, though I am a practical man in this line, on the question of digging a channel there, as you have other men here more familiar with that part of the question than I am. I want to say that the companies which I represent are much in favor of this project and are ready to assist in any way they can in order to straighten this channel across these shoals. We must go in and out as well as the steamers. We use the best caution we can, as well as they do. The sailing vessels also must use it. We have to contend with them, because we have a long tow. If it is thick, one flashes up possibly but a very few feet away from us, and it is a serious question very many times how to clear the tows, and it is a wonder that more steamships, schooners, and coal barges do not drop in going over these shoals than there is.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. ALFRED ABBOT.

Capt. ABBOT. I represent the New England Coal & Coke Co., of Boston. We carry over 1,000,000 tons of coal across the shoals every year. Our ships draw 26 feet of water. We approve of this proposed channel. We generally use the Great Round Shoals Channel. We have a great number of delays going through there owing to the cross currents. We would like to have this other channel. It would minimize collisions.

Col. ABBOT. You go around the Great Round Shoal on account of your deep draft?

Capt. ABBOT. Yes, sir. We lose 24 hours often waiting for a chance to go through. We have been detained owing to the cross currents, and if you can not see 2 or 3 miles ahead you can not make it.

Col. ABBOT. Where does your coal come from?

Capt. ABBOT. From Virginia ports.

STATEMENT OF MR. GEORGE H. WOOLLEY.

Mr. WOOLLEY. I represent the Commercial Tow Boat Co., of Boston. Our company is engaged in carrying coal from Virginia ports to Boston. We carry from 150,000 to 175,000 tons of coal per year. Barges arriving at the shoals in a driving wind are handicapped for lack of water and endangered by collisions. Frequently vessels are headed off by the wind, and they are then obliged to anchor, mainly in the channel, which, as the channel is only three-eighths of a mile wide, with other vessels anchored in it, gives vessels passing through it very little room to work in. A new channel will greatly relieve this situation, as then, if the wind should die down, they will have room enough to anchor on either side, which they do not now have. We utilize over 22 feet of water. Great Round Shoal Channel is used almost exclusively. Tows are very often obliged to anchor there for the night, not daring to go out. When morning comes, the weather has changed. Much time is lost in this way. This channel would be a great benefit to everyone using Nantucket Shoals.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. T. E. HAWES.

Capt. HAWES. I represent the International Steamship Co. I was born in Chatham and have been familiar with conditions down there since I was 9 years old. I have seen the channel change. I do not see any reason why the channel proposed would not be a nice channel. I have been on most of the towboats. When we want to go through there we get tangled up with schooners, which puts us in a bad fix. We get tangled up with steamers, too. If they will dredge that channel out it will keep clear itself. The full strength of the tide runs that way. Of course, you get out of Boston, with the wind northeast, and bound to New York, or farther south, and come down by the Capes, and you may get into a snowstorm. Not many want to go in through there; they generally hold up. If you had a straight channel there, you could come down and go right on through. Now you can not do it. Last winter four schooners were lost there. I came down through the slue and was held up by two schooners on their way up on my weather bow. I had to stop to let them go by. The next morning three schooners were piled up on the Stone Horse Shoal. All hands were lost. If this channel was there, they could have gone on down to the Handkerchief and anchored. That is all I have to say.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. J. W. HAMMOND.

Capt. HAMMOND. I am superintendent for and representing the Staples Transportation Co. I was born and brought up in Chatham, and from boyhood have navigated in these shoals. The ground has been pretty well covered by the previous speakers. We send 350,000 tons of coal over these shoals yearly, two-thirds from southern ports and one-third from New York. I have noticed that the channel through Pollock Rip Slue has deepened in 30 years, and it now remains fully as deep as it ever has been. I saw for the first time this morning the chart showing where the proposed channel would be, and I can not indorse it too strongly. I think it is the proper thing to do. Many disasters have occurred from the fact that the course has changed so much. We hardly realize, until we are in it ourselves, how great is the amount of danger involved in the changing course down from the Handkerchief, going off nearly four points one way and then back nearly eight points to make these turns, involving the dangers of cross tides and anchored and navigating shipping. We certainly approve this proposed channel.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. H. L. HOPKINS.

Capt. HOPKINS. I am secretary of the Pilot's Association in Boston and necessarily come in contact with the majority of the men using this passage. I do not think there are any representatives here of one or two of the following concerns. I can say they are in favor of it. We have a number of light vessels running through there with coal, and they want considerable room. The channel is rather narrow. The concerns I refer to are the Chesapeake Steamship Co. and, I think, the Metropolitan Coal Co. They are heartily in favor of this proposed channel. I am in touch with the men using this channel. We endeavored to get through with 14 feet of water several years ago; now that same channel has from 20 to 22 feet of water, showing that it is growing deeper and not shoaler.

STATEMENT OF MR. J. M. CHERRY.

Mr. CHERRY. I represent the T Line for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. We have 34 barges which round Cape Cod, with 5 tugs. They haul 435,000 tons of coal annually. I can not speak from the standpoint of a navigating officer—only that of superintendent—but I do know from the reports of our navigating officers that it would be a great improvement to have this proposed channel, and I most heartily indorse it. We have here Capt. D. R. Chase, who will be glad to say something about the navigating end of the business.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. D. R. CHASE.

Capt. CHASE. I do not know as I could explain any more fully or clearly the conditions at that part of Nantucket Shoals than the gentlemen who have preceded me. They seem to have covered the ground pretty well, but having been probably in a different position at times than the rest of the officers, and having been in charge of the barges, which is particularly a unique position, I can say that I have been out on a hawser, as they state, 200 fathoms long. At times we do have them of that length. At times we had only 75 fathoms. That matter is regulated altogether by the conditions. If it was a thick fog, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.'s barges would shorten our hawser before we got down to this channel. I have been through there as a master for 12 years, and was a native of Harwich, 7 miles north. I was on the shoals considerably, as a boy, fishing and otherwise.

I do not know where the money can be utilized to any better advantage than in that new channel as proposed; I can not think of any other place, and have often expressed the opinion that when we get down to the Handkerchief and we turn to go out to Pollock Rip, it was a pity that this channel, which seemed to be a natural one, could not be straightened. I have seen the Ralph M. Hayden and the Charlotte Miller go across there. The straightening of the channel would, in my estimation, greatly reduce the dangers of collisions. Everyone who follows the sea will notice that on easterly winds the vessels are using Vineyard Haven, under Nobska Point; the wind holds them up for a few days, perhaps a week; and then the vessels congregate, and they meet in this narrow channel. I do not see how they ever do keep clear. They remind me of Capt. Charles Barr, who sailed the cup defender, jockeying around for position, only with this difference, their jockeying around was for the purpose of saving human life. I have heard some good things here to-day. There is lots to be benefited by this improvement that has not yet been seen or even thought of. Of course these tows coming down through there are enormous; they represent the big tonnage. We all know these barges must be towed on a hawser. I realize that the schooners seem to be more in the way than the steamers, having no propelling power of their own. This channel will open a direct line, and that is what we need at this time.

I shall give my hearty cooperation to the movement and hope that the improvement will be put through.

Col. ABBOT. Is there anybody else who wishes to speak?

STATEMENT OF MR. CHRISTIAN E. METZLER.

Mr. METZLER. I represent the Philadelphia & Reading Transportation Line. We have in service 11 ocean tugs and 63 barges with a carrying capacity of 100,000 tons on a summer schedule, and a little less on a winter schedule, per month. We carry to New England 1,500,000 tons of coal annually; 300,000 tons goes to Bangor and the Penobscot River. We are heartily in favor of this channel. I know that from September 17 to 20 there were 20 tugs with from 40 to 60 barges anchored, storm bound, in the vicinity of Woods Hole and northwest of the Handkerchief, and I am of the opinion that they were there for two or three days, some of them. If this channel had been in operation they could have started along before they did and some could have gone right through, but they could not get around the lightships at Pollock Rip and Shovelful. The channel would have given them a straight course from the Handkerchief. Many of these boats, coming up that way, especially from the Penobscot River, go out to sea, leaving the cape 40 or 50 miles to the westward. The channel would give them a direct course and I believe if it were in operation it would prevent many of the delays on the shoals. I want to say for the Philadelphia & Reading Transportation Co. that we are heartily in favor of the improvement.

Col. ABBOT. I would like it if you could give me an estimate of the value of one day's delay for one of your tugs with a tow of three barges.

Mr. METZLER. I could better give that if I knew the freight rates on coal. The Conostoga, which is somewhat better than any of the rest, made 11 round trips between Philadelphia and New England and back in 78 days, with three barges each way. Sometimes she went to Boston only and sometimes she went as far as Fort Point. Our barges carry from 1,000 to 3,000 tons of coal each. They tow three of these barges and carry probably on an average from 4,000 to 5,000 tons of coal a trip. All things being favorable, they make that trip in three days one way and three days back. We allow 72 hours to come up and 65 hours to come home in fair weather. Oftentimes we are held up four or five days. If a tow can handle from 4,000 to 5,000 tons of coal, bringing the loaded barges up here and taking the empty ones back in six or seven days, the delay of a day means a considerable. The rate for freight on the coal and the expense of running the tug would, of course, figure in it. I do not know what that would be. I am simply what a train dispatcher is on a railroad. I am given the barges and I ship them. The train dispatcher may not know what is in his cars or the rate of freight. It is the same way with me.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE, M. C. I think Capt. Lavender can show the growth of the business and the change in freight rates.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. R. M. LAVENDER.

Capt. LAVENDER. In February, 1865, which, as you all know, was during the War of the Rebellion, we carried coal from Philadelphia to Portsmouth at $4.75 a ton; later it was $4.50, then $2.50. Now it is 60 cents. That is 15 cents over the Boston rates. That goes back to February, 1865.

I think, Mr. Chairman, as to the cost of delays, we have here Capt. Hammond and others who can give that almost to a penny. That channel would be one of the greatest things that ever happened to Boston for people going over these shoals. Capt. Hillary would not have to wait outside for 12 hours if he had a straight channel. That would enable him to navigate that channel on one side. He would know where to find his vessels; he could go through with perfect safety. The proposition, as laid out here, is not much of an engineering problem. I do not think there is anyone more familiar with the question than Mr. GREENE, at one time chairman of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. This channel will banish the thought of collision. The Government would compel boats to keep to one side going in one direction and to the other side when going in the opposite direction. The only time there would be any danger would be when some man violates the rules or a stranger gets in there. Capt. Hillary would know where he is going to find the ships and would have no trouble, either with his passengers or his company.

Col. ABBOT. Is there anybody else on that side who wishes to speak?

STATEMENT OF MR. GEORGE W. ELDRIDGE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am George W. Eldridge, chart maker. I represent no one but myself and humanity—sailors. I came here to listen and to say a few words, perhaps.

For 50 years we have surveyed Nantucket Shoals. We have surveyed over Pollock Rip and vicinity 18 times. I was born at Chatham and know that country pretty well. I have advocated this plan for more than 10 years. In fact, I believe it absolutely originated in my brain. I have published a book on the tides for 36 years, and for years I have written articles and printed them in that book annually on this very thing. Within 50 years there have been three channels formed in the vicinity of Pollock Rip. I have no doubt, in fact I believe, that all the sand forming Nausett and Monomoy Beaches and Monomoy Shoal comes from the highlands of Cape Cod. The storm waves wash it down and drive it along the shore, down, down, down, forming, as I say, Nausett Beach, Monomoy Beach, and Monomoy Shoal. Shoals are formed by tidal eddies and not by tidal currents. A snow bank is formed by an eddy, or a calm zone in the atmosphere, and sand works in the same way. When I was a boy, I was with my father the first day we threw a line there. The old ship channel was east south one-fourth south of the Fort Point Lightship. It then formed the slue. It broke through. In 1850 I went ashore dry shod on Pollock Rip exactly where this proposed channel is now being considered. In August of this year the depth there was 16 feet. The second channel was the slue of Pollock Rip; the old channel filled up, then came the slue of Pollock Rip. I believe it has deepened from 16 to 24 feet by the action of the propellers of steamers. Some years ago I observed that the water began to deepen right through the main body of Pollock Rip—dry 50 years ago.

I have come to the conclusion that the third channel was being formed. All this sand comes down and turns off to the south. The main body of the current is west-southwest by east-northeast. That is about the lay of this proposed channel. That is the third channel that has been formed across these shoals within my recollection. If dredging is done there now, that will take care of it for years undoubtedly. The channel is very narrow between the Stone Horse and the Shovelful. The Shovelful has been working off sand and narrowing up the channel, as the captains well know. I advocated years ago that the north end of Stone Horse Shoal be cut off. By this plan you will give them a good, wide channel to approach Pollock Rip, and then with this channel across Pollock Rip it would be all right. As to collisions, for 40 years I have been employed as an expert as to collisions. Some 20 years ago William K. Vanderbilt's steam yacht Alva, valued at half a million dollars, was sunk in collision with the steamship H. M. Dimock, running between New York and Boston. I was in that case, and I have been on some cases of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. Many millions of dollars and many lives have been lost in this Pollock Rip Channel. Some years ago I wrote a little verse on the subject, reading like this:

"There is a coaster's hell,
And there is a coaster's heaven.
One is Pollock Rip
And the other is Vineyard Haven."

In regard to the Cape Cod Canal, I really do not consider that it enters into this matter at all. I have always considered it a fiasco and have opposed such a canal. All practical mariners do also. I do not believe it will be used to any great extent, for many reasons not necessary to relate here. It has nothing to do with this matter. Vessels will continue to cross the shoals. The American public desires this channel. I do not know any part of the coast where so little money has been spent as Nantucket Shoals. The Government should spend millions of dollars there in aids to navigation and for mariners. They come here now and ask for our opinion. I believe in it, I approve it; it is the thing to do, and it is bound to come. They ought to have it; they deserve it, and I believe it is the thing to do.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM S. GREENE, M. C.

Representative GREENE. I have been seated here and listened to the remarks made by the gentlemen who use the great water highway, which is as important certainly as any highway on the land, and we are improving highways on the land to-day, and everybody is moving forward in that direction. I have realized more fully than ever before the importance of this project. It so happens that I represent the district which embraces Nantucket, Vineyard Haven, and Marthas Vineyard, and at one time I represented all of Cape Cod. By the growth of the cities, Cape Cod slipped out of my district, and I presume now that Nantucket and Marthas Vineyard will also go in the next reapportionment. This matter is a national question. Some speak of its importance to Boston. It is important to everyone, to every man sailing the sea, whether foreign or domestic, or whether he has schooners, steamers, or barges. My mind went back, as I have been seated here, to the time I went to work in 1858 for a man in the wholesale coal business, and I thought of the freight rates in those days and of the size of the schooners and sloops of those days compared with the vessels, steamers, and barges of the present day. When we engaged a 250 or a 300 ton schooner we were looked upon with astonishment at that date. We were bringing coal to New England. Now the sizes have increased many thousand tons, and the stories told here to-day as to the amount of this commerce, if they are within the facts, would seem like romances.

It seems to me that this project ought to be reported upon favorably and acted upon favorably by the Congress of the United States. We hear in these days a great deal about conservation—conservation of our resources. The most important conservation of all is that of human life, the preservation of the lives of those who are born into the world for the good of the world, as we believe. These children born into the world grow up into men and go down into this dangerous spot and their lives are sacrificed, as they have been—countless thousands of them—in this dangerous spot. That alone, if there was nothing else—never mind the question of the loss of vessels and cargoes—the loss of human life alone ought to make this measure sure. I am glad that this board has the matter under consideration. I happened to be the humble instrument that started it in Congress, and though I may not hereafter represent directly the district that it is in, indirectly I represent every district in the United States; there is no people or land from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Alaska to the Panama Canal, and out to the Philippine Islands that I do not represent. I am prepared to advocate this project in every way, both before the committees and on the floor of Congress, and I say that this project is not one that affects New England alone, not Boston alone, but it affects every land and every sea and is a project so worthy that it ought to have the support of everyone, regardless of what conditions he may find in his own home or his views of the political questions of the day. It is a national project. I hope your board will report the subject fully and fairly, and I will be glad to examine the report when made. You should relieve the anxiety of these captains and vessel owners.

I have not seen very much of the world; I was never outside of our own land; some time I hope to go across the ocean. I hope to go to the Pacific coast and see the Panama-Pacific Exposition. I want to see all I can. I realize that life has its limitations and that I have not many more years to live, but I was favored with a strong body and I hope to see a great deal more. To-day is the time to do this work; now is the accepted time, and with all the delays that come afterwards in getting appropriations and putting the thing through, we ought to lay the foundation for this improvement secure, and then build the structure, that all the men and all the women of the future generations will praise the work that we do here to-day. [Applause.]

Col. ABBOT. Is there anybody else?

Mr. CHERRY. I would say that our steamers carry between eight and nine thousand tons, our schooners between three and four thousand tons—our transportation company alone.

Capt. CULLIN. You asked the question as to the cost of delay. I say approximately $450 or $500 a day would be lost by a tug waiting to go through the Shoals. With one of our steamers, if delayed, her time is reckoned at 5 cents a ton a day, which would be about $400 for 1 day alone, if she were delayed 24 hours on Nantucket Shoals.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield the gentleman from Louisiana such time as I have left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida has only four minutes remaining.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Four minutes will do me no good. I ask unanimous consent to be heard for 30 minutes on this bill.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The gentleman can get an hour.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I ask for an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can be recognized for an hour in his own right without asking anybody's consent.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. But you have been trying to pass the bill, and I did not know I was going to get a chance.

The SPEAKER. Whenever debate shall cease it is the business of the Chair to put the question.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. All right; I ask to be recognized now to proceed in my own right for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to one hour.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield so I may ask the chairman a question with respect to amendment No. 78, relating to the Missouri River? Is it his understanding that the effect of that amendment is that the localities benefited will not be called upon to pay their share of the local expenses until Congress acts again?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Referring now——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. To the Missouri River amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, certainly; that is the understanding.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then, really the effect is the same as if the provision were not in the bill at all.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I agree with the gentleman.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, by the unanimous action of the members of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, I am directed to present a partial report (No. 1029) and ask to have it received. The committee held hearings and examined witnesses from the Supervising Architect's Office; and upon official documents presented by the Secretary of the Treasury and the testimony of the witnesses is drawn this partial report, signed unanimously by the committee, and I ask to have it received and printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks to have a report signed by all the members of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear what the gentleman says. Unless he talks loud enough for the House to hear, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman now presents a partial report from the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, signed by every member of the committee, and asks that it be received and printed. That was the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman have to present it in the open House? What does he want by that; why does not the gentleman drop it in the basket?

The SPEAKER. Well, that is the proper thing to do, but the gentleman asked unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. I know, but unanimous consent to present a report to the House may be considered as equivalent to granting it a privileged status. I do not know what the gentleman's reason is—I have no objection, of course.

Mr. CLINE. I might have been under a misapprehension of the practice, but I had assumed that a report from the committee, in order to pass it through the basket without first having recognition, must be based upon a bill of some character or upon a resolution. Now, this report is based simply upon a hearing and upon the official documents from the Secretary of the Treasury, and I asked to have it received for that reason, because the committee is not reporting upon a bill or resolution referred to it. It makes a report signed unanimously, and makes some suggestions by which they believe that the administration of the Supervising Architect's office could be improved.

The SPEAKER. The proper course without asking unanimous consent is to put it in the basket.

Mr. CLINE. I will put it in the basket, Mr. Speaker, if that is the practice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman desires to have this report introduced and referred to some committee, that is one thing. Making suggestions will not do any good, I concede, unless it is referred to somebody.

Mr. CLINE. I am not asking to have the report referred; I am not asking for a privileged status for the report; I am asking the report be received and printed according to the request of all the members of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman can do that by putting it in the basket.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the rule puts it in the basket, but the gentleman is asking unanimous consent. Is there objection to this unanimous consent?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands I do not care anything about it except the matter of practice.

The SPEAKER. The trouble about the thing is there is no rule about the practice, and there ought to be one established. The gentleman from Illinois objects to this, and therefore it goes into the basket under the rule.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I am not asking to have this report printed in the RECORD. I am asking to have it printed as any other report from a committee is printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent to do that, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. CLINE. Then I will put it in the basket.

THE FRIGATE "CONSTELLATION."

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. UTTER].

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Speaker, for some time there has been lying at the naval station in Newport, as an inspiration to the boys being there trained for service in their country's Navy, the old frigate Constellation. Lately it has been rumored that she was to be broken up. The Rhode Island Society of the Cincinnati, at its annual meeting on the last Fourth of July, passed certain resolutions in opposition to such a disposition of this noble old vessel, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing those resolutions.

The minutes of the action and the preambles and resolutions are as follows:

SOCIETY OF THE CINCINNATI IN THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
New York, N. Y., July 15, 1912.

Resolutions concerning frigate Constellation.

At the annual meeting of the Society of the Cincinnati in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, held, pursuant to law, in the senate chamber of the Colonial State house, Newport, R. I., on July 4, 1912, Mr. Oliver Hazard Perry, of New York, offered resolutions concerning the historic frigate Constellation, which were seconded by Bvt. Brig. Gen. Hazard Stevens, former United States Volunteers, and a member of the Boston bar, and unanimously adopted. Mr. Oliver Hazard Perry is a grandson of his namesake, Commodore Perry, of Lake Erie fame, and great-grandson of Dr. Benjamin Franklin. Gen. Stevens received the medal of honor of Congress for most distinguished service in action during the War of the Rebellion.

The preamble and resolutions are as follows:

Whereas it is understood to be the intention of the Secretary of the United States Navy to remove from Newport harbor the historic American frigate Constellation, with ultimate intention of destroying the vessel as of no further value; and

Whereas when Congress provided for six frigates to be built to resist the depredations of Algerian corsairs on the commerce of the country, viz, the Constitution, President, United States, Congress, and Chesapeake, the Constellation, 38, as one of these, was built after the accepted model of Mr. Joshua Humphrey, of Philadelphia, and was launched at Baltimore, September 7, 1797, and, with the frigate Constitution, is now the last of the beautiful wooden frigates of the old American Navy and is hallowed in the memory of the American Nation for the battles they fought and victories gained in defense of the flag; and

Whereas the record of her achievements may briefly be stated as follows:

Going first to sea in June, 1798, the Constellation in August following safely convoyed 60 sail of American merchantmen from Habana to the United States, and early in January, 1799, captured two French privateers—La Diligente and l'Union.

On February 9, 1799, off the island of Nevis, in the West Indies, the Constellation, still under Commodore Thomas Truxtun, met the fine French frigate l'Insurgents, 40 guns, and, after a fierce combat of an hour, in which the enemy sustained a loss of 70 men killed and wounded, compelled her to strike, and thus added another first-class frigate to the American Navy.

On February 1, 1800, Commodore Truxtun gave chase to the French frigate la Vengeance, 52 guns, off Guadaloupe, and the Constellation, closing, fought a terrific night action, losing her mainmast and 25 killed or mortally wounded, the enemy finally escaping in the darkness, when supposed by the Americans to have sunk, and reaching Curacoa in a sinking condition, with 50 killed and 110 wounded and 186 round shot in her hull, an action so glorious that Congress gave Commodore Truxtun a gold medal.

In 1801 the Constellation, under the same commanding officer, was the first in the race to the Mediterranean to attack Tripoli, even though she had sprung one of her masts while crossing the Atlantic.

In the War of 1812, although blockaded at Norfolk by a British squadron, her crew greatly annoyed the British.

Her subsequent peaceful cruises and stations are found in the records of the Navy Department.

After the War of the Rebellion, she was sent to Annapolis for the training in seamanship of the United States naval cadets.

In 1878 she went to France with the exhibits for the Paris Exposition, and in 1880 she took provisions to Ireland.

She then went into the naval training service, and since 1890 has been attached to the naval training station in Newport Harbor, where, viewed annually by thousands, she continues a patriotic inspiration to the American people; and

Whereas Narragansett Bay, where she is now at anchor, promises to develop into the naval base of the country, and the cost of maintenance of this frigate is small, and her removal and contemplated destruction would, in all probability, be viewed with deepest regret by the whole Nation as an unnecessary act: Therefore

Resolved, That this society earnestly protests against any contemplated removal or destruction of the frigate Constellation, dear to all

Americans, and respectfully requests the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Navy, to issue such order as in his judgment may be desirable or necessary to retain in Narragansett Bay, the Navy's birthplace, this historic American frigate, as an inspiring monument of the American Navy and its splendid achievements;

Resolved, That these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States;

Resolved, That a copy be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

ASA BIRD GARDINER, President.
GEORGE W. OLNEY, Secretary.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] will yield to me for a statement.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will yield two minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think it will take two minutes.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Louisiana, in his speech, will take up the question to which I am going to refer. That is in regard to the Government now entering into partnership with the local authorities in the construction of levees to prevent floods. In my judgment this is a new departure, and the establishment of a new policy for the Rivers and Harbors Committee and for Congress. I do not believe that the gentlemen who favor this policy will find that they will be able to long confine this policy to the Mississippi River. I am not going to discuss now whether or not it is a wise policy, but I am calling attention to the fact that in my judgment it is a distinct departure, and there will be pressure brought from all portions of this country for the Government to help protect communities from flood. I know that that will be true on the Pacific coast, I know it will be true in my particular district, and I believe it will be true all over the country.

Now, my particular district is an illustration of the general condition. We have a navigable river, one that is being improved by the Government. It is subject to overflow. Three years ago there was an overflow and between three and four million dollars' worth of property destroyed. The farmers themselves construct levees by levee districts under the State law. The State has been asked to help maintain these levees, and the people of that community have been writing and petitioning me to have the Government help take care of those levees, to help protect them from these floods, and if you are going to do that on the Mississippi River there is no logical reason why you should not do it everywhere in the country. As one member of the committee, I certainly will not be controlled by the proposition to limit these flood appropriations to the Mississippi Valley.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. So I ask the gentleman to take up this question.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the item in this bill appropriating $6,000,000 for the next fiscal year for the Mississippi River—an increase of $2,500,000 over the sum of $3,500,000 appropriated by the House. This addition was due to the disastrous floods of the Mississippi River which have appalled the Nation, and which occurred after the rivers and harbors bill passed the House. Of the $6,000,000 herein appropriated, $4,000,000 is specifically set aside for the repair and construction of levees, the lines of which were broken in a number of places in Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, as the enormous volume of water gathered in the river forced its way south from Cairo to the sea. I do not anticipate that any objection will be made to the action of the House conferees in agreeing to the Senate increase, as I know from your previous generous actions the sympathetic feeling prevailing for the distressed people of the lower valley.

A NATIONAL QUESTION.

The control of the Mississippi River is a question of vital importance to all who live beside its banks, and one of very great concern to all the people of the United States, by reason of the enormous interests involved. That the country is awake to the importance of this truly national subject is evidenced by a Mississippi River plank in both the Republican and Democratic platforms. The national convention of the Republican Party, assembled in Chicago in June, declared in its platform:

The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property.

These floods are national in scope and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem; hence, we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control, so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

In the platform of the Democratic Party adopted at Baltimore a few weeks ago are found these striking words:

We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel and prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

To maintain an adequate depth of water the entire year, and thereby encourage water transportation, is a consummation worthy of legislative attention and presents an issue national in its character. It calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and the Democratic Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation leading to that end.

Moreover, the chief exponent of the National Progressive Party, ex-President Roosevelt, has in several recent public utterances declared unequivocally in favor of national control and prevention of the Mississippi River floods.

Thus we see that the three great political parties clearly recognize the obligation the Nation owes to control the mighty stream which courses through the heart of our Republic. For two centuries the dwellers on its shores have been suffering from floods because the local authorities were too feeble to control them. In view of the terrible toll of this year's overflow, it is hoped that these party declarations will be carried out to the letter. The National Government alone has the resources and the authority to undertake and prosecute to successful completion a gigantic work of this character, and it is expected by the citizens of the lower valley that the next administration—whether it be Republican, Democratic, or National Progressive—will undertake the immediate control of the Mississippi in a businesslike way and give them the protection so much needed and so long deferred.

The first levee was constructed in front of New Orleans in 1717, and there has been a gradual, steady growth ever since, until now levees extend on both banks of the river, except for short distances at the mouths of the Red, the Yazoo, the Arkansas, the White, and the St. Francis, throughout the entire valley as far north as Cape Girardeau, Mo., not including portions of the eastern bank of the river where the highlands come very close to the stream, leaving only a small area adjacent thereto subject to overflow, which has not been leveed. A large portion of the valley was fairly well protected by levees prior to the Civil War, but during that period and the years of anarchy which followed many breaks occurred in the levees and a number of them were washed away. Comparatively no work was done on them for a long period and they were in a very incomplete and weakened condition when assailed by the great flood of 1882. This flood broke the levees in 284 places and overflowed nearly the entire valley. Thereafter a splendid spirit of cooperation developed between the citizens of the interested communities, the States, and the National Government, and a great impetus was given to levee building with the result that at the beginning of this year, 1912, there were 1,496 miles of levees on the Mississippi River, many of which had been completed to the commission grade of 3 feet above the highest water, though it would have required 53,000,000 cubic yards costing about $11,000,000 to complete the entire system to that grade.

NATION'S DRAINAGE DITCH.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of force in what has just been said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and what was stated a few moments ago by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] about flood conditions in their localities, about the necessity of building levees there, and the question of the Government contributing to those levees if it is to build them on the Mississippi River. I shall not attempt to go into an academic discussion of that question at this time. There are too many points which I wish to touch upon in the brief space allotted to me. But I wish to suggest this point to Members of the House: It is very different when you have local floods produced by rains in the vicinity of a local stream from having floods as a result of accumulated waters of 40 per cent of the entire Republic. The floods on the Mississippi River south of Cairo are caused by all the waters that fall between the Alleghenies on the east and the Rockies on the west. I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to this map which I had prepared by the Engineer Department. You will notice a yellow line running near the Atlantic coast. If you will follow this line you will observe that it goes up into the State of New York and then passes through Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and down into Georgia and Alabama, leaving a portion only of those Atlantic States to the eastward of the line.

All to the westward of it sheds the waters that fall thereon into the Mississippi River. It is not generally known that a large portion of the State of New York, a very considerable portion of western Pennsylvania, some even of Maryland, through the Youghiogheny River; a large part of Virginia, through the New and Holston Rivers; a considerable portion of North Carolina, through the French Broad River, and portions of Georgia through several rivers, are drained into the Mississippi. Those are all Atlantic States, and yet they shed water into the Mississippi River, which is obliged to pass the city of Cairo, Ill., and thence for a thousand miles to the Gulf.

Now, if you will jump 2,000 miles across the continent you will find by this map that the western shed of the Mississippi River begins on the eastern edge of Idaho, and all the waters of Montana and practically all those of Wyoming go down into the Mississippi. A considerable area of the Dominion of Canada also flows down through the Missouri River system, and finally enters the Mississippi.

Look along the Great Lakes, gentlemen, and you will find that in New York there is the smallest little strip of territory between the headwaters of the Mississippi and Lake Erie. Look here in Michigan. The watershed of the Mississippi goes practically up to the shores of Lake Michigan, practically up to Lake Superior. Probably 41 per cent of this continent, it is estimated, has its drainage through the Mississippi. Well has that great stream been called the Nation's sewer or drainage ditch.

Now, in all fairness can it be said that you must apply the same reason—the same logic—to such a stream as that and to one referred to by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], for instance, though I dare say there is great merit in his, and I am not prepared to say I will not vote for it? I have always been considered too liberal on these measures. There is a vast difference between the floods of that mighty stream and the one discussed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. It is a well-established principle of common law that a man must so use his own as not to injure his neighbor. I do not blame the people who live on the headwaters of these streams for having their waters poured down on the lower valley. They have a right—an absolute right—to drain through the Mississippi. Nature excavated that ditch, and the waters naturally flow through it.

THE MISSISSIPPI PROPERTY OF REPUBLIC.

That great river is the property of the entire Union; and just as a private person must so use his own as not to injure his neighbor, it is the duty of this great Republic so to use its own property as not to injure the property of the dwellers on that lower valley.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Just in one moment. Is it the property of the Republic? Unquestionably it is. No State can legislate in regard to the Mississippi. All the navigable rivers are the property of this Republic for purposes of navigation. No State can even authorize a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi. No State and no individual can divert any of its waters. It belongs to the United States, and being the property of the Union it certainly is the duty of Congress to legislate in regard to it so as not to injure the people who dwell on its banks. We have that power under Article IV of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. The Constitution also gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce, to establish post offices and post roads, to lay taxes, to promote the general welfare, and so forth. Now, the power to regulate commerce and establish post offices and post roads surely carries with it the obligation to control and protect the commerce, post offices, and post roads when once established. A great flood, such as that which recently swept down the Mississippi River, practically ruined commerce, even by boat, for there were no landing places for the boats in a great many places; it stopped all carriage of freight, passengers, and mails by rail and post road; it prevented hundreds of thousands of citizens from receiving any mail, or only at long intervals and greatly increased cost to the Government; and destroyed the established order of things and created chaos throughout a vast section. The general welfare was destroyed by these floods, for surely the term "general welfare" may be applied to such a large portion of the Union as the overflowed section of the Mississippi Vallely, with its more than 3,000,000 souls.

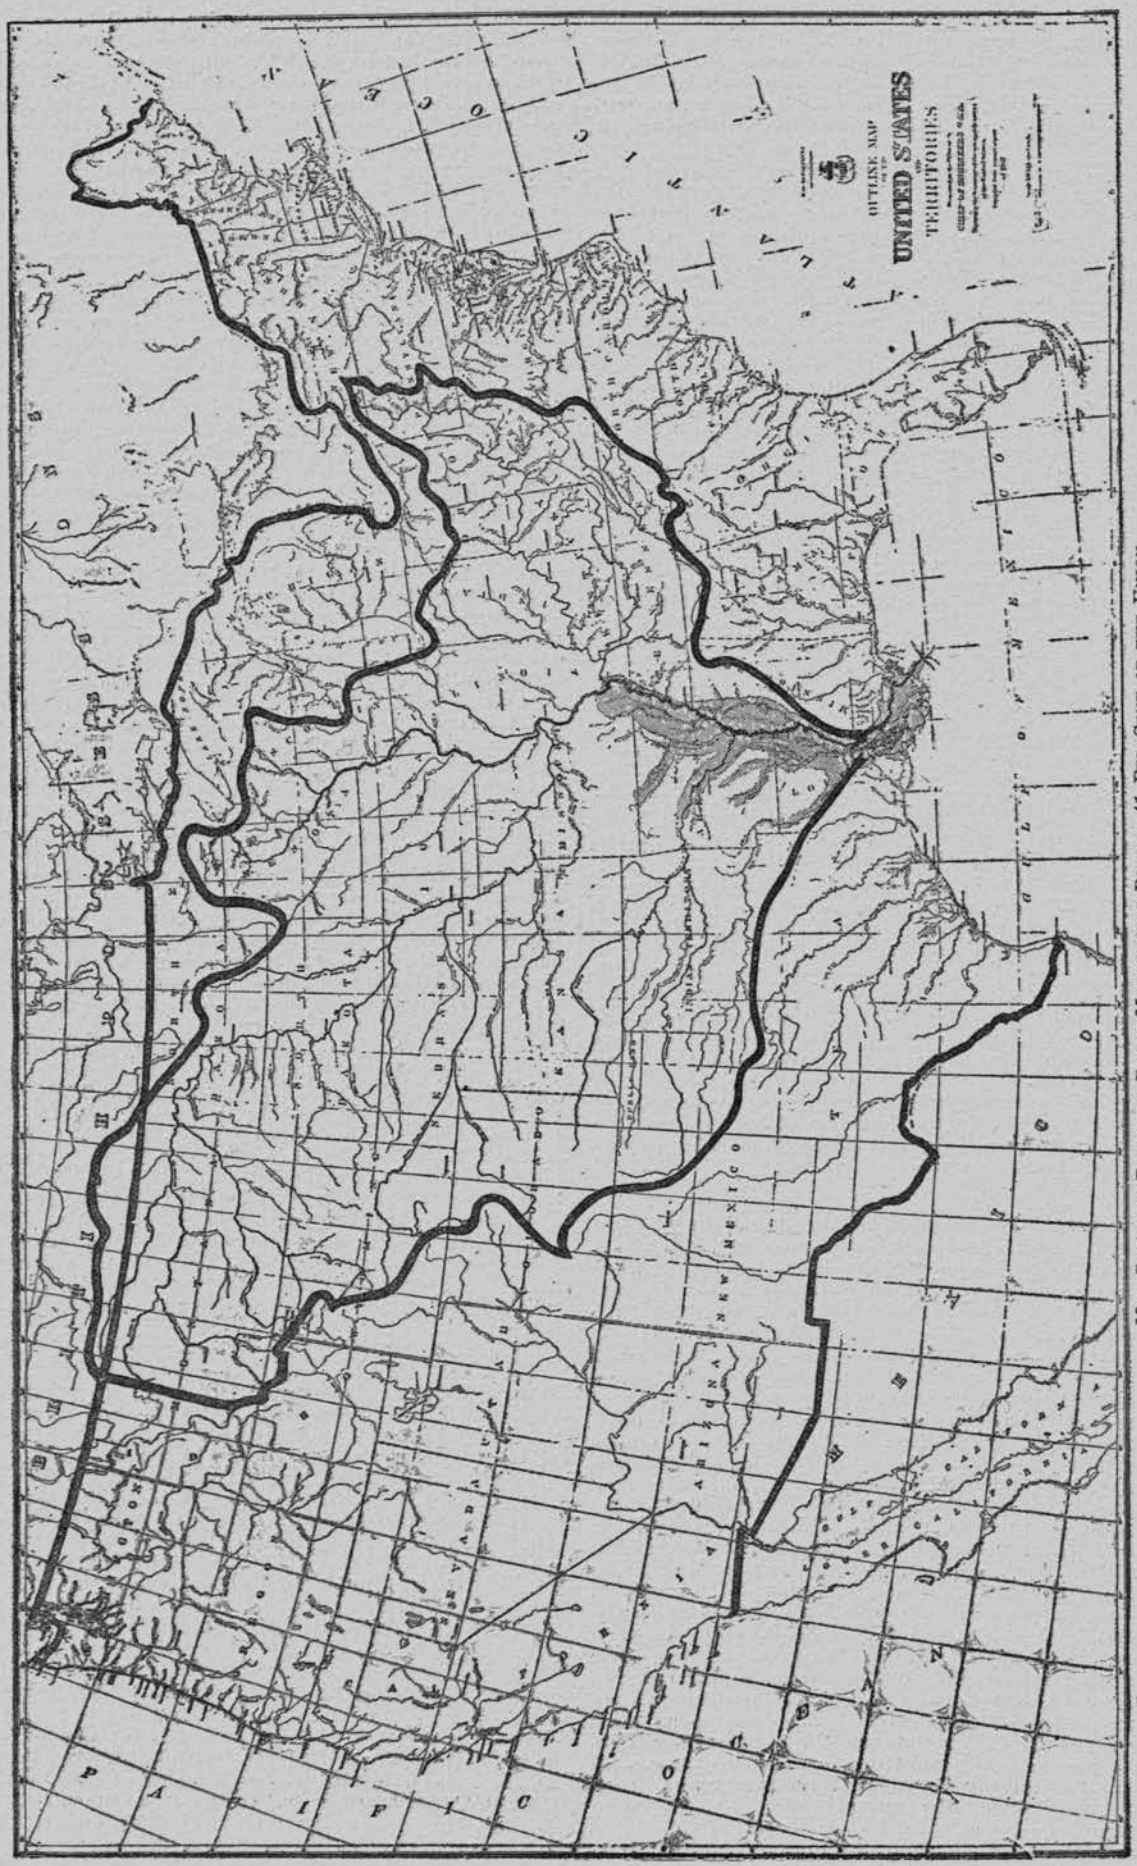
When the awful pestilence of yellow fever invaded the land Congress hesitated not to grapple with and eradicate it, for it affected the health and happiness of millions of people. When the bubonic plague appeared on the Pacific coast it was stamped out by the efforts of the Nation's servants, and a vigorous fight is now being made against it in Porto Rico and Cuba. When the foot-and-mouth disease broke out among the live stock of New England Congress took charge at once and completely eradicated it. When our war with Spain demonstrated the necessity of uniting the fleet in both oceans Congress undertook the construction of the Panama Canal, and that colossal work will soon be a reality. When it became apparent that our Western States could not, out of their own resources, reclaim and settle their arid regions in the same manner as other public domain Congress undertook the task, and over $70,000,000 has been expended in reclaiming the desert wastes of the far West, making them bloom like the rose and become prosperous and contented portions of our great Republic.

No one questioned the right or the wisdom of Congress to do any of these things. They were great pieces of statesmanship, which will reflect credit on the Nation. Surely the reclamation of the 17,000,000 acres of overflowed lands in the Valley of the Mississippi is just as necessary from a national viewpoint and will be just as productive of welfare to the Nation as the reclamation of 3,000,000 acres of arid land in the West. Surely the development of this splendid valley and its consequent habitation by fifteen to twenty million souls, producing crops and wealth of various kinds aggregating in value every year more than the total cost of the Panama Canal, is of more importance than even that great work, of which our Nation is so proud. Surely the prevention of the Mississippi's floods, which carry in their wake death and pestilence comparable to yellow fever and the bubonic plague among human beings, and infinitely more fatal to animal life than the foot-and-mouth disease, is more worthy of national endeavor than either of those three most deserving efforts of our national father.

I can not believe that Congress will hesitate to spend the few millions necessary to protect this splendid region and make of it a veritable garden spot—beyond question the richest single asset in the whole Nation.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have two questions that I want to ask of the gentleman. In the first place, it is not claimed, as I understand, that these levees are needed for purposes of navigation.



LEVEES NECESSARY FOR NAVIGATION.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is claimed that they are needed for purposes of navigation. A number of the best engineers this country has ever produced have said that if there were not a single citizen living along the banks of that river, levees should be built in order to preserve the navigation of the stream. Some of the engineers do not think the levees are needed for navigation, but the Mississippi River Commission, which was placed in charge of that great river by act of Congress in 1879, and which has been spending money thereon for the past 30 years—the first appropriation having been made in 1882—has always declared by a majority of its members that the building of levees is necessary for navigation, and has built them in part for navigation and in part for the protection of the riparian lands.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Conceding the correctness of the statement the gentleman has just made, how far up the stream and to what extent up its tributaries does the gentleman think the principle for which he has been contending ought to apply?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. The Mississippi River Commission, under act of Congress, has been authorized to build the levees up to Cape Girardeau, Mo. It was created by act of Congress approved June 28, 1879, and in 1882 the first direct expenditure of money by the National Government for levees was made under this commission, which appropriated that year about $1,000,000 to assist in rebuilding and strengthening the levees. The commission is composed of seven members appointed by the President—three from the Engineer Corps of the Army, one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, two engineers from civil life, and one lawyer. Its duties were defined by the act in part as follows:

To take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service.

MAP SHOWING DRAINAGE BASIN MISSISSIPPI RIVER—41 PER CENT OF THE UNION.

Since 1882 the commission received annual appropriations of about two millions a year until 1910, when the sum of four millions was allotted, but this was reduced in the act of 1911 to three millions. With these sums a vast improvement in the navigable channel has been secured, and a depth of 9 feet, with a width of 250 feet, is now maintained at the lowest stages of the river.

LOWER MISSISSIPPI EXCEPTIONAL.

The general idea of Congress, so far as I have been able to ascertain, in legislating in regard to that river was that from the vicinity of Cairo downward a very unusual state of affairs existed. The watershed of the Ohio has more rainfall than that of either the upper Mississippi or the Missouri, and most of the great floods on the river below Cairo come from the Ohio and its numerous tributaries. But we also have the upper Mississippi and the Missouri, with the many rivers that pour into them, all uniting in the lower Mississippi.

I wish to say that it was thought that this vast accumulation of waters from Cairo down made an abnormal condition of affairs, one entirely different from that existing in any other section of the country. And whether or not that was a wise principle to adopt I am not prepared to say, but it has been the policy of this Government for the past 30 years.

Whether that policy will extend to other rivers remains for future Congresses to pass upon. Laws are constantly being changed. Policies of government are changing. We hear a great deal about progress, and perhaps we are going to progress along lines of waterway legislation, as well as other lines. I sincerely hope so. Heretofore, however, this has been considered the one great exception which proves the rule, and Congress has not been appropriating for levees at any other point in this country, so far as I know, except on the Mississippi River.

Let me, in further answer, remind the gentleman that there are some other big streams down in my State in addition to the Mississippi. Louisiana is the best watered State in the Union. Look at the Red River, the course of which you can trace over here into New Mexico. For a long way it is the boundary between Oklahoma and Texas. It runs through the great State of Arkansas and passes through Louisiana for several hundred miles. There are five levee districts along that river. It has a very elaborate system of levees, and sometimes terrific floods, but Congress has never helped to build those levees. The people of Louisiana and Arkansas built them. The same is true in my own congressional district of the Ouachita River. I suppose there are Members of Congress here who do not know there is such a river on the map. It rises way up in the State of Arkansas, accumulates a vast body of water there, is certainly an interstate stream, and yet the people of my congressional district are obliged to build levees out of their own resources to guard themselves against the waters of Arkansas, just as those along the Red are obliged to construct levees to protect their lands against the accumulated waters of New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas, and Arkansas.

FLOOD DAMAGE.

We are interested in levee questions and floods along several rivers in Louisiana, and they are of the greatest moment, but none of you can conceive what a flood on the Mississippi River is. I know something about it. I have lived there for 30 years. I own property on the banks of that river, and when the awful floods came down upon us like those of the past spring—the greatest on record, when the water at Cairo rose 2 feet higher than ever before in the history of this country—those waters broke through the levees in the vicinity of the city of Cairo, doing enormous damage in the State of Illinois. They broke over into Missouri and Kentucky, doing considerable damage there. They broke their bounds and swept over the fairest portion of Arkansas, and then, gaining headway, in a great avalanche they swept on to the Gulf and again snapped the levees in lower Arkansas, in upper Louisiana, in the Yazoo delta in Mississippi. Again in the southern portion of Louisiana, below the Red River, they swept on, bearing death and destruction in their path. They destroyed many millions of dollars' worth of property—no man can say how much, the most conservative estimate being between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000. They destroyed between 40 and 50 human lives directly, and God knows how many as the result indirectly from exposure and suffering caused by those awful overflows. They destroyed many thousands of animals—horses, mules, cows, sheep, and hogs. They swept away many barns and houses. In some instances the waters poured piles of sand from 1 to 6 feet deep over thousands of acres of land, practically destroying farms which but a short while before were of the greatest value.

You can hardly conceive the damage of a flood like this. Take it in my own State, for instance, in the southern portion, where we plant cane. You have heard much about free sugar this session, and you know something about Louisiana sugar. We produce a great deal of it. The sugar cane is planted only every third year. When the cane is destroyed by a flood like this, no crop can be grown that year, and the loss is not only the loss of the current crop, but the loss of the seed cane for two successive crops. An enormous cost it is. Up in my portion of the State we raise cotton, and some of us attempted to plant cotton, corn, and peas after the waters receded, myself among the number. A letter came yesterday from my manager telling me that the cutworms, which are always much worse after floods, had cut all the corn down twice. Some of you farmers know perhaps what the cutworm is. On my plantation practically the entire corn crop of about 500 acres was planted and destroyed three times, once by the floods and twice by the cutworms, and what is true of my property applies generally in the flooded district. The manager says these worms are the most ravenous things he ever saw, that they are actually eating the grass on the turn rows, and are turning their attention to peas and cotton. Gentlemen, this is a serious question to the people down there. The item of loss is very hard to estimate. I do not bring these things up, however, to appeal to your sympathies. I appeal to your sense of justice. I ask the Congress of the United States to be more liberal than it ever has been before to levees, because it is right, just, and proper that it should be.

STATE AND FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO LEVEES.

Some gentlemen have asked, What about the local communities; what have they done? I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] is not here now. I wish he were. In my State, Louisiana, since 1865 we have contributed for levees on the Mississippi River and the interior streams something over $36,000,000. I can not say what was spent on levees prior to 1865, but upward of $36,000,000 have been contributed by Louisiana and her citizens since that time. During the same period the people of Mississippi, and only a comparatively small portion of that State is subject to overflow, have expended for levee building over $23,000,000. In Arkansas, where, in most places, they have been constructing levees for only the past 18 years, they have paid over $6,000,000 for levees. Hence you see that over $65,000,000 have been contributed by these three States for building levees, and for what purpose? For protecting themselves against their own water? No; but to guard against the water that falls in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and away across the continent in Montana, Wyoming, the Dakotas, the Dominion of Canada, and in all of the Great Lakes and Western States.

Forty-one per cent of this continent has poured its waters down on those people, and they have given over $65,000,000 of their money for building levees to guard against the floods of this immense portion of the Republic. Is that fair? How much has Uncle Sam done in the meantime? He has contributed about $26,000,000 to aid in the construction of these levees from Cape Girardeau south. Is it at all wonderful, my friends, that at this time—following this awful flood, this flood so destructive of life and property—the people down there should ask Uncle Sam to take care of his own property, to guard them against the Mississippi River which belongs to him? It certainly is nothing but right, and I am happy to say that Congress is meeting us in a more liberal spirit than ever before.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I hesitate to interrupt the gentleman, for I know the House would be glad to hear him even beyond his hour. The gentleman speaks of the contribution of the United States to the levees from Cairo down to the Gulf as being something about twenty-six millions.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. In round numbers.

Mr. CANNON. In round numbers. What has been the contribution for mattresses and dredging?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures, but for bank revetment it is something like sixteen millions. It is hard to differentiate the various appropriations. There is a considerable fleet of dredge boats used to aid in the navigation of the river—something like 9 or 10—and they assist by dredging the shallow places. The river is confined to its channel by bank revetment as well as by levees.

The last report of the Mississippi River Commission showed in the neighborhood of $14,000,000 for bank revetment to June 30, 1911, and it must have been nearly $2,000,000 since then.

Mr. CANNON. Counting the bank revetment, there is probably something near half and half contributed by the United States and by the States and the people.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Possibly! In reality it is about $65,000,000 by the States and local people for levees, and $42,000,000 by Congress for levees and revetments.

Mr. CANNON. What I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman is this: I was down in the Yazoo country for the first time, off the river, a few months ago, and that, as well as the trip down the river from Cairo to New Orleans a year or two ago, was somewhat of an eye opener to me. The gentleman will recall that trip.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It was a very interesting trip to me, but without that experience I began away back in the early eighties, I think in 1882, to vote for a contribution on the part of the Federal Government for the navigation of the Mississippi River, and as an incident thereto the protection of that magnificent stretch of land from the Mississippi River to the hills, especially on the east, and also the magnificent area on the west. I am perfectly willing to keep at it, and I am quite in harmony with this emergency appropriation of $4,000,000 for the levees, but I am under the impression that, so far as the levees are concerned, if we could have appropriations promptly voted by the Federal Government, and something also by the State governments, on the half-and-half system, it is entirely practical in the next decade to have the levees sufficient, if they are properly policed and watched and maintained, to protect the country upon each side of the Mississippi River. I am under that impression.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. The gentleman is correct in that, in my judgment.

Mr. CANNON. I think, also, that in the stretch of two decades or three, and it may be earlier than that, from Cairo down to the Gulf, there will be no more thickly populated country than that magnificent bottom. It dwarfs the Nile—yes; a half dozen Niles. Now, I was talking with a gentleman whom I met down there on both trips, and when I was in the Yazoo Valley on that trip I found it wonderful when the danger comes and when life and property is in danger the contributions that the inhabitants make along the river for policing and warding off people who are evilly disposed and getting everybody to the work for the protection of life and property was probably worth more than all the men who could be assembled by the engineers working alone.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. That is literally true. I have taken part in it myself many a time.

Mr. CANNON. I also express the hope that nothing will ever be done that will entirely relieve the inhabitants of the south Mississippi from vigilance and contributions to their own preservation, hand in hand with the Government, thus insuring navigation and protection. I want to say that much, because it is becoming fashionable—from newspaper reports—to claim that the United States should do all the construction and permanently police and maintain the levees by appropriations from the Treasury, and that the people can fold their arms and repose on downy beds of ease without attention and without care.

LOUISIANA'S LEVEE TAXES.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say I thank the gentleman very much for what I consider his real contribution to this argument. The people throughout the entire valley are assisting in levee building to the best of their ability. I agree with nearly everything he has said. To show that the levee district in which I have the honor to reside, composed of four parishes along the Mississippi River, from the mouth of the Red River to the Arkansas line, proposes to do its part, within the past 10 days its commissioners have gotten permission from the Louisiana Legislature to issue $500,000 of bonds for the purpose of aiding in the construction and enlargement of levees. Now, let me tell you what these people do in the direction of local taxation for levees. We pay a levee tax of 1 per cent on the assessed value on all of our property, real and personal. We pay a levee tax of 5 cents per acre on every acre of land regardless of its value. We pay a levee tax of $1 on every bale of cotton, and cotton is the great staple crop of that country. We pay a levee tax of $100 per mile on every mile of standard-gauge railroad.

I have stated the special tax which is contributed in the levee district in which I live. Gentlemen will understand it is not the congressional district, because we do not divide the levee districts according to congressional districts. My congressional district is composed of 16 parishes, while the fifth Louisiana levee district, where I live, is only four parishes. Each locality in the overflowed sections of the State is set aside by the legislature in a district, according to its needs and the similar interests of its people. There are 17 of these levee districts in the State of Louisiana. They are presided over by boards of commissioners, with local power of taxation. I am not going to go into detail now, as I know the House is getting tired, but to show you how we deal with this question my State every year contributes for levees about $1,500,000. We certainly have been helping ourselves.

Gentlemen, we have never come to Uncle Sam empty handed; we have always gone to him with at least $2 in our hand when we asked him for $1 to help take care of these mighty floods which I have shown were not Louisiana floods, but the waters of the entire Nation. Think of that enormous sum of $1,500,000 every year. Louisiana, bear in mind, is not an overflowed State. Why, some papers indicated a short while ago that the whole State of Louisiana was under water—was overflowed. We have something like 45,500 square miles of territory, and only 14,695 square miles is ever subject to overflow or could get under water, and as great as the floods of this year have been, only 40 per cent of this, or 5,878 square miles, was overflowed. So, you see, only a small percentage of the State is subject at any time to overflow, yet so strong is the levee sentiment there that every dollar's worth of property in that State, even that on the high hills—and some gentlemen may be surprised to know that we have hills—every dollar's worth of property, real or personal, in the State of Louisiana pays a levee tax. A very interesting letter from Maj. F. M. Kerr, chief engineer of Louisiana, is hereto attached as Appendix A.

The people in the Delta sections of Mississippi pay taxes in the same way for levees, and so do those of Arkansas; but, my friends, I say to you that with this overpowering force coming down upon us from the accumulated waters of nearly half the Union, it is your duty to do more to assist us than you ever have done in the past, and I firmly believe you are going to do it. I appeal to you as a matter of justice. We do not contemplate ceasing our efforts to help ourselves, but we are not in position to do much in that overflowed section. Our taxes come from our crops, our crops were destroyed by the flood waters, and we can not go on helping ourselves until we have had a chance to make more crops.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Certainly.

COMMERCIAL IMPORTANCE OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SHARP. Several years ago it was my great pleasure to accompany a good many Members of Congress down the Mississippi River to view the improvements already made and those that were expected to follow. I personally was very greatly interested in what I saw there, and the possibilities of the development of the commercial trade along that river. I observe that the gentleman, who is more familiar with this subject than perhaps the rest of the House combined, from his own study of it, has in his argument devoted the most of his time thus far to the position that this great stream furnishes a drainage and is carrying the overflow water of so many other streams. Is it not also true that it differs very greatly from the other streams that have been mentioned here in the sense that it is emphatically a commercial proposition, and that with the improvements we hope will go ahead by congressional encouragement will open up many of the tributaries that now enter into the Mississippi River and afford cheaper transportation? And is it not also true that every dollar practically that is put into these levees in making them permanent in their nature also aids the stream and makes it more navigable and stable?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Unquestionably. I believe I stated that some of the very best engineers insist that those levees are essential to the navigation of the stream. I firmly believe it myself. I have myself observed that when there is a crevasse in the levee, and the waters pour out, there is a diminution in the current; and when the current slackens this great sediment-bearing stream, filled as it is with heavy material gathered in the Missouri and from the caving banks all along the river, drops a portion of its load, and you will always find a big sand bar below a crevasse, which causes very poor navigation in the river. Let me give you one little piece of history. I went to Lake Providence to live in 1882. That year we had one of the greatest floods on record. Two hundred and eighty-four crevasses occurred in the levees of the Mississippi River in the spring of that year, and for two or three years thereafter we did not have more than 4 to 5 feet of water over a number of the shallow bars. Several years later, when the breaks had been closed, the navigation began to improve, and for more than a decade we have had an average of 9 feet over these same bars. We have fine navigation in the river now, and we will always have good navigation if we keep the levees up; but if we allow them to go down the bars will show up again as in the past.

DO LEVEES CAUSE BED OF RIVER TO RISE?

There are one or two general questions I would like to discuss, and I will do it for just a few moments. In connection with this river there are many fallacies. People are accustomed to saying that the levees cause the bed of the river to rise higher and higher, and that if we continue to build the levees in a little while the bed of the river will be higher than the surrounding country. That same fallacy was uttered years ago by Abbe Huc, a Jesuit, who traveled in China, about the Hoang-Ho or Yellow River, and so many people have repeated it that it is generally believed.

Now, gentlemen, you must differentiate between the surface plane of the river at flood and the low-water plane of the same river. At my home, Lake Providence, La., the river rises and falls 48 perpendicular feet. At extreme low water it is 48 feet lower than at extreme high water. In the period of low water you look out into a great gully, as it were, with a little narrow stream trickling along at your feet, relatively speaking. But at high water it is a mighty torrent, about 2 miles wide at that point, and its flood plane is higher than the surrounding country by 12 to 16 feet. I have driven along the streets of that town, and as the waves would dash against the levee because of the wind, the spray would splash over into my buggy. But in the low-water season, which prevails for the greater portion of the year, you drive across that levee, and from a quarter to half a mile to the bank of the river, and then look down into a deep gulch there and see the water. There is a vast difference between the two.

Gen. Comstock, late Chief of Engineers, and a very accomplished man, testified before the Commerce Committee of the Senate in 1890 (see Rept. of the Secretary of War for that year, p. 3093) and gave a very interesting account of the views of the engineering world in regard to the rising of the beds of such rivers as the Po, in Italy; the Rhine, in Germany; and the Hoang-Ho, in China. He says:

From the examination of the Po and Rhine it may be concluded that if their beds rise in the leveed portions (which is not entirely certain from the data), it is at so slow a rate as not to be an important factor in the maintenance of a levee system. With levees 10 feet high, if the bed rose at the rate of 1 foot in a hundred years, the cost of raising a line of levees having the length of the present Mississippi system, about 1,300 miles, by this 1 foot would be but about $4,000,000 distributed over the country, or $40,000 per annum, which is a small part of the annual cost of the system. On the Mississippi the records, while not extending over a period long enough to give final results, do not, so far as they go, indicate that the bed has risen.

In regard to the Yellow River he quotes from a letter of Gen. James H. Wilson, United States Army, dated May 6, 1890, as follows:

In conclusion, I do not hesitate to say that I can not but believe that Abbe Huc was entirely mistaken in regard to the silting up of the channel, and that an exhaustive survey would prove beyond a doubt that no such silting as to raise any part of the bed above the adjacent country has ever taken place.

I understand that the present members of the Mississippi River Commission concur with Gen. Comstock's views on this subject. Its secretary, Col. C. L. Potter, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, wrote me on May 22 last:

There is little doubt in my mind that levees, which are regularly held, will not cause any rise in the river bed—probably a lowering.

A member of the commission, Mr. J. A. Ockerson, wrote me on May 7, as follows:

Some years ago the commission undertook an extensive series of observations, covering several hundred miles of river, to determine whether such a thing as a systematic rise of the river bed was going on as the result of levees. This investigation and the results show that an interval of 25 years of time failed to show a general systematic elevation of the bed, but on the contrary the low-water bed in some well-defined cases has been actually lowered several feet.

Another member of the commission, Mr. C. H. West, wrote on May 10:

The bed of the Mississppi River is not rising, but on the contrary the tendency is in the opposite direction—that is, as a result of the control of moderate floods by levees and the limited prevention of caving banks by revetment the crest of the shoals have been depressed and the carrying capacity of the channel increased. With complete confinement of the floods by levees and complete control of caving banks by an extended application of revetment, there can be little doubt that there would follow a decided lowering of the crest of all shoals and also a further increase in the discharging capacity of the channel, which would result in a lowering of the height of the flood planes.

Prof. Willis Moore, Chief of the Weather Bureau, wrote me on May 9:

So far as indicated by the low-water records, the bed of the lower Mississippi River is at substantially the same level as it was 40 years ago. However, there has been much difference of opinion on the subject, and the evidence from the low-water records is not conclusive, owing to the recognized tendency of low water to scour alluvial river beds.

Let me give personal testimony in this connection. When I went to Lake Providence to live, just 30 years ago next month, it was not unusual to see several steamboats stuck on the bars of the river, for the depth was not more than 4 to 5 feet on the shallow places, and the zero marks on the water gauges were then where they are to-day. The Weather Bureau keeps a record of all these great rivers, and it has made no change in its gauges in the last 40 years. To-day you go along the river in the vicinity of Lake Providence at low water and find the bed of the stream apparently as it was then. You find the low-water mark, or zero gauge, the same as it was in 1882, but instead of 4 to 5 feet of depth you find 9 to 10 feet. The river bed is actually lower now than it was then. That seems to me to prove conclusively that there has been no rising, but rather a depression, though, my friends, it is true that the flood plane has risen. And why?

FLOOD PLANE HAS RISEN.

Ask the governor elect of Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] if in the great St. Francis Basin—6,700 square miles of area in his State and Missouri—there was not an enormous reservoir only a few years ago which protected the lower valley to a great extent by impounding a tremendous volume of the flood water. Within the past 18 years levees have been built along the front of this basin which hold back the floods. Fine towns have grown up, farms have been developed, railroads have been built—hundreds of miles of them—and peaceful, happy, prosperous communities now exist where 20 years ago was a howling wilderness of waste waters and swamp lands. Moreover, it is true that within the last quarter century there has been a very great increase in the area of lands placed in cultivation in the Valley States, especially Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri. Many shallow lakes which formerly impounded a large quantity of the spring rains have been drained and put in cultivation, notably, as an illustration, the East St. Louis flats. A very thorough system of farm drainage has been adopted in many places which carries the rain water off the lands almost as rapidly as it falls and rushes it quickly into the adjacent rivers, which in turn carry it rapidly into the Mississippi. And all of these things have the effect of increasing the volume of flood water.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement of the gentleman from Louisiana in that particular, so far as it relates to the State of Arkansas, is entirely correct. Many hundreds of thousands of acres have been reclaimed from overflow and are now in cultivation. Within the total area of Arkansas less than one-eighth is subject to overflow, but it consists in large part of the most fertile lands in the State. I am entirely in sympathy with the statement made by the gentleman from Louisiana, who knows more about levees than any man living in the United States. The State of Arkansas has been contributing under a system similar, but different in some particulars, from that prevailing in Louisiana to the extent of the ability of the citizens of that State, and while I do not believe the time should ever come when the citizens of this overflowed area should be relieved from the responsibility of contributing a fair share to the support and maintenance of these levees, I do regard this proposition as national in its character, and I believe it is fair that the Federal Government should contribute liberally to the maintenance of these levees. The gentleman from Louisiana has clearly and ably disclosed the relation which the Mississippi Valley sustains to the commerce of the Nation. Its possibilities, if reclaimed to cultivation and made safe from overflow, can not be overstated. The waters which occasion these overflows, as he has said, find their source principally in other States and, gathering volume, are precipitated into the lower river, which is now protected by a system of levees maintained for the greater part by local organizations under State laws. The States bordering on the lower Mississippi have done their best to afford adequate protection. They have levied heavy taxes and in times of threatened floods furnished guards to protect the levees. It is difficult to conceive the anxiety felt by the citizens of the flood district when breaks in the levees occur. Could the history of the recent floods in the lower valley of the Mississippi be accurately written, it would unfold sacrifices and heroism unexcelled. Realizing the peril, when breaks are threatened the people combine every energy and resource to prevent them. Men and women alike volunteer their services and toil unceasingly to prevent disaster. I concur in the opinion that a part of the burden should remain on the localities directly concerned.

I believe, too, that the Federal Government should assume supervision and control of the entire Mississippi River levee system, and if the gentleman from Louisiana has time and the opportunity is afforded, I should be glad to hear him discuss that feature of the subject.

FEDERAL SUPERVISION NECESSARY.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I thank the gentleman from Arkansas for his eloquent discussion of this matter. I quite agree with him that it would be wise, eminently wise, for the General Government to have supervision and control of these levees, in order that we might have one central authority without any division of effort or of plan; and I shall do my utmost to bring about that state of affairs, although I wish to say that, so far as the State of Louisiana is concerned, there never has been the slightest friction between our local engineers and the engineers of the United States; but, on the contrary, the most splendid spirit of cooperation and united effort during all the years that we have been building levees together.

It certainly would be wiser, however, if Uncle Sam is going to do more and more of this work, as I believe he is, for us to let him have the supervision and control of these levees. I shall be delighted to see it, and I hope it will be done.

COST OF RECLAMATION BY LEVEES AS COMPARED WITH IRRIGATION.

The present levee system has cost about $91,000,000, as I have shown, and if forty millions additional be expended to complete it, this will make a total of one hundred and thirty-one millions, the expenditure of which will have been extended over half a century. On the basis of 17,000,000 acres protected, this sum of $131,000,000 would mean an average of about $8 per acre. Let us compare this with what it has cost to redeem the arid lands out West. According to a letter of Prof. F. H. Newell, Chief of the Reclamation Service (see Appendix B), about 1,000,000 acres have been reclaimed, and three millions are now in process of reclamation, the expenditure so far being $70,000,000, and the average cost $40 per acre. This is certainly a very favorable comparison for the overflowed section—$8 per acre to protect against floods in the Valley and $40 per acre to irrigate in the arid regions. I heartily favored the national reclamation act, and believe it to be one of our wisest pieces of constructive statesmanship, and just as I believe in its wisdom I also think it would be wise for the Government to reclaim, at so much less cost, the magnificent lands of the Mississippi Valley.

I have estimated that the total cost of reclaiming these valley lands by levees since 1865, including forty millions to be spent hereafter, is $8 per acre. Now, of the ninety-one millions already expended, the National Government has contributed only $26,000,000 and the States the remainder, so that if the Government should now undertake the entire task and expend forty millions additional, aggregating a total expenditure by it for levees of $70,000,000, it would be only $4 per acre contributed for land reclamation in the Mississippi Valley by the National Government, as compared with $40 per acre for reclamation of the arid lands. Believing that this is a fair proposition, I have introduced a bill providing that Congress shall expend eight millions a year for the next four years, in addition to the sum carried in the pending bill, to complete the levees, and it will be vigorously pressed next session.

LEVEES FURNISH PROTECTION.

I wish to say a few words on another question that is frequently discussed, and that is: Will the levees do the work? Will they save the country? In my judgment they will, beyond question. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. If we build the levees 3 feet above the flood plane of the river this year and increase the dimensions in proportion, they will be strong enough to resist the pressure, even should the water rise to the very top. It is only a question of money and dirt to accomplish this. During the present flood, the greatest on record, there were no breaks in the upper Yazoo levee district of Mississippi—124 miles in length—which is in charge of Maj. T. G. Dabney, C. E., and none in the Pontchartrain, Orleans, and Lake Borgne districts of Louisiana—208 miles in length—though no one can say what might have happened in those four districts had all of the other levees held and the entire volume of water been kept in the river. It would be prudent to elevate all of the levees at least 3 feet higher than the height attained during this flood, if possible, and proper allowance should also be made for greater elevation at points where the highest flood was prevented by crevasses above them. The problem is not susceptible of exact solution, but some of the most eminent engineers on the river, who have been connected with it for a great many years, think that wherever the levees have been already raised to the Mississippi River Commission grade, adopted several years ago, an increased elevation of 3 feet with proper dimensions would make them impregnable.

The commission grade contemplated for levees was 3 feet above any previous water, 8 feet on the crown, with slopes of 3 to 1 on each side, and a banquette, or additional levee, on the land side, coming within 8 feet of the top, and having a crown of 20 feet. The general plan of the Dabney levees in the Upper Yazoo district was the same height as that of the commission, with a 10-foot crown instead of 8, a slope of 4 to 1 on land side and 3 to 1 on river side, and a banquette 40 feet instead of 20, reaching within 6 feet of the top instead of 8, thereby giving very material increase of volume and strength to the levee. Moreover, there are other details in connection with the Dabney levees, which are very important, and are set out in detail in his letter to me of May 17, 1912, which is published herewith as Appendix C. I would like to see all of the levees raised, as suggested above, and constructed along the lines advocated by Maj. Dabney.

Let it be plainly understood, however, that there is no difference of opinion among the engineers in regard to the wisdom of the Dabney specifications. The only trouble has been that heretofore money was so scarce that the various State engineers, and also the Mississippi River Commission, felt obliged to do the best they could with the limited funds at their disposal. They all realized that the levees would be infinitely safer if constructed as advocated by Maj. Dabney, but were obliged to adopt lesser dimensions owing to insufficient funds, whereas his district could carry out his plans, because it was more fortunate in a financial way, having a larger area of improved lands.

While no exact estimates have been made of the cost of such an enlargement of the levees, as I have indicated, it is thought by conservative engineers that it will amount to between 30 and 40 million dollars, and that an expenditure of that sum will enable the levees to resist any floods which may be expected to come against them.

Even during the great flood of this year the levees protected fully 55 per cent of the valley. The total area of the valley subject to overflow is 29,970 square miles, and the area normally protected by levees is 26,569 square miles, equal to 17,004,160 acres. Of this area 12,390 square miles, equal to 7,929,600 acres, were inundated, and the remainder, amounting to 14,179 square miles, or 9,074,560 acres, was saved from the flood. Hence, it will be seen that the measure of protection was very great, even this year, and warrants the cost of the entire system. It must be borne in mind, also, that not since 1903 has there been a disastrous overflow, although a large percentage of the valley would have gone under nearly every year had not the levees protected it, for the spring freshets of every season rise considerably above the normal banks of the river, and but for the levees would overflow the riparian lands. As a result of the levee system the people of the entire valley received and enjoyed immunity from overflow during each of the nine years from 1903 to 1912, and in the former year, 1903, only 6,820 square miles, or 26 per cent, of the lowland sections was overflowed. Prior to 1903 there were five years of immunity, but in 1897 the floods swept over 13,580 square miles—about 51 per cent of the valley.

The levees have constantly been growing stronger and stronger for the past 30 years, since the great flood of 1882, which inundated practically the entire valley, and it was thought that they would withstand any normal water. However, the flood of this season was not normal but very extreme. The highest point ever before reached on the Cairo gauge was 52.17, while this year it rose to 54 feet, or about 2 feet higher than ever before known. Such a thing may never happen again in a great many years. On the other hand, it might occur at any time, and our people might again suffer at some distant future day just as the people of Paris recently suffered from an inundation of the Seine, of which they little dreamed until it came upon them.

I have lived on the banks of the Mississippi River in the very heart of the overflowed section for 30 years, have been a close student of the river, and especially its levee system during all of those years, and I firmly believe that if we build our levees 3 feet above the flood plane of this year, with a 10-foot crown, a slope of 3 to 1 on the river side and 4 to 1 on the land side, and a 40-foot banquette, and all the incidentals in regard to muck ditch, preparation of the base, and so forth, advocated by the best engineers, our people will be as safe in their property and usual avocations as those of any other section. This may cost thirty-five to forty million dollars, surely not more, and that sum is a bagatelle when one considers the enormous interests involved directly upon these levees, which protect 17,000,000 acres of the finest land on earth, an area greater than the combined extent of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, and Maryland; greater than Holland and Belgium; sufficient to support in comfort fifteen to twenty million human beings; and to produce annual crops aggregating four to five hundred million dollars in value. Even at the present time, with its sparse population of about 3,000,000 souls, and in many instances inferior methods of cultivation, the crops of this valley amount annually to over a hundred million dollars in value of cotton, sugar cane, rice, corn, oats, hay, live stock, and so forth. In its present undeveloped condition it is one of our richest national assets, and when developed—as it surely will be within a few years—when complete protection from the floods is given us, no like section of the country can boast of greater wealth.

CAN FLOODS BE PREVENTED BY RESERVOIRS?

Another subject frequently discussed and much misunderstood in connection with the protection of the lower valley from overflow is that of reservoirs. Theoretically reservoirs as means of controlling floods are all right, but practically I doubt if they will work when applied to the lower Mississippi River. The volume of water is too great to be impounded in any feasible system of reservoirs ever yet devised. Beyond question, if enough land in the various river valleys which pour their floods into the Mississippi were condemned and the rain waters impounded therein the floods could be controlled thereby, but the remedy would be worse than the disease. It would require a large area in Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Tennessee, where lands are fully twice as valuable as in the lower Mississippi Valley, and the cost thereof would be colossal.

Reservoirs to protect the city of Pittsburgh from overflows, for instance, are entirely feasible, and they can probably be constructed at a reasonable cost—about $20,000,000—with immense benefit to that city, but of no material effect on the Mississippi floods below Cairo. During the great high water of this year there was never any serious flood in the Allegheny River, and Pittsburgh did not suffer in the least. Hence a perfect system of reservoirs on the Allegheny and the other tributaries of the Ohio which empty into it at and near Pittsburgh would have had no restraining effect on this year's floods in the lower Mississippi. The same would apply to reservoir systems located on the upper Mississippi above St. Paul and the Missouri above Sioux City. We received no flood waters this year from the upper portions of either of those rivers, and rarely ever do we suffer from floods at their headwaters. Hence reservoirs thereon would have been of no avail.

The great floods of this year, according to Mr. Willis Moore in the letter above alluded to, were caused by "six rainstorms over the watersheds of the Ohio and lower Mississippi Rivers between March 11 and April 2, the storms following each other at intervals of a little less than four days. At the time that the rains began the lower Ohio and lower Mississippi Rivers were at moderately high stages on account of an Ohio River rise earlier in the month of March. The main floods came from the Ohio and its tributaries, principally the Cumberland, Tennessee, and Wabash Rivers, but there was a considerable increment from the lower Missouri River, the upper Mississippi River below Keokuk, Iowa, and from the Arkansas, White, Ouachita, and Yazoo Rivers. It should also be stated that the winter preceding the floods was an unusually cold one, the soil over the watershed above Cairo was well frozen, and, as a consequence, the run-off from the rains was probably much greater than the normal amount."

Neither of the three big rivers—Ohio, upper Mississippi, and Missouri—was in great flood this year, but they combined their waters at Cairo—an occurrence which rarely happens—and it was the united force of all three which caused the trouble. The rains were not in the headwaters of any of these rivers, but in the lower portions; and I know of no place or places thereon at which efficient reservoirs could have been constructed within the bounds of reasonable cost.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if he has given consideration to the question of what area would be required to be submerged by reservoirs in order to accomplish the purpose of protecting this flooded area, and I would like to state in that connection that I myself have devoted as much attention as I have been able to give to a study of the subject and have about reached the conclusion that it would require the submerging permanently of almost, if not quite, an area equivalent to the area of the overflow region of the valley in order to protect against floods such as those which the gentleman from Louisiana has been discussing.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I think the gentleman from Arkansas is absolutely right. Common sense tells you that if you are going to build reservoirs and take care of a body of water like that, you must make them sufficiently large to contain the amount of water that would otherwise overflow and go over the submerged country.

A letter on that subject was recently written to me by one of the most accurate engineers of the Mississippi River Commission, Col. C. L. Potter, from which I quote as follows:

Some idea of the storage area necessary to hold back a flood equal to that of 1912, so that it would not go over the banks—in other words, to protect the valley without levees—may be had from the following: The total volume of water passing the junction of the Red and Mississippi Rivers in one day at the crest of the recent flood would cover to the depth of 20 feet an area of 200,000 acres, or over 300 square miles.

The idea of attempting to prevent floods by the use of reservoirs is, to my mind, so utterly absurd that I hate to put in an argument against it. Of all the streams of the Mississippi Valley, the only places where land can be had at reservoir prices are at the headwaters of the Mississippi or of the Missouri. In the recent flood there would have been little effect produced on the lower river if the Mississippi had been cut off at St. Paul, and the Missouri at Mandan. There was rainfall enough south of St. Paul to do it all. It is easy enough to hold the rainfall at a point, but you can not hold it at all points. In 1905 I was on a board of engineers on the reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi. I heard a paper mill just below the lowest dam on the Mississippi proper make a complaint that the Engineer office had closed the dam and left them without power to run their mill; and that was true. At the same identical time a town less than 150 miles below registered with us a complaint that the Engineer officer had not closed the dam and thus protected them, as he should, from one of the most disastrous floods they had ever had. Of course they wouldn't believe it, but they had a disastrous flood within 150 miles of the foot of the great system, and with the nearest dam to them closed tight. You can not hold in Montana or Minnesota water that falls as rain in Illinois or Missouri. When you get into the Ohio or the middle or lower Mississippi Valleys, the cost of land for reservoirs is too great to be considered.

Judge Robert S. Taylor, of Indiana, one of the greatest lawyers in America, a member of the Mississippi River Commission for nearly 30 years and our foremost authority on Mississippi River problems, delivered a learned discourse on "Levees, Outlets, and Reservoirs" before the Association for the Advancement of Science, at St. Louis, Mo., December 30, 1903, and speaking of reservoirs (pp. 12 and 13) said:

On the subject of reservoirs little need be said. It is a delightful scheme to think of and talk about. It would beautify the map with lakes throughout the upper valley. It would bring the delights of boating, fishing, and swimming within the reach of millions of us to whom they are now inaccessible pleasures. It would remove all danger of a surplus in the National Treasury for a long time to come, and it might reduce the surplus in the Mississippi River somewhat.

When men think of reservoirs in this connection they commonly locate them in the headwaters of the Mississippi and the Missouri. Unfortunately it is not there that the rains fall that furnish the stuff for great floods, but in the valley of the Ohio and its tributaries. The storms that sweep from the southwest across the Ozark Mountains and on over Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Tennessee are the bearers of woe to the people of the alluvial valley. One of the consequences of those rains has been to make the region where they fall so fertile and attractive that it is filled with population, farms, cities, railroads, factories, and all the adjuncts of high civilization. To occupy the country with the reservoirs necessary to hold back a great Mississippi flood would involve an incalculable destruction of property, to say nothing of the cost to build them.

There is one place where it would be possible, in an imaginative sense, to impound a volume of water that would be missed from the river. That place is the St. Francis basin, 6,700 square miles in area. By cutting that area up into subdivisions by dams crossing it at frequent intervals and increasing in height progressively downstream as rapidly as the slope of the land surface would permit a vast storage of water could be secured many feet deep at its lower border. But the only material that can be found there to make the dams is earth. The expense of stone would be scarcely thinkable. And to imprison such a volume of water at the head of such a valley as would lie below it, with only earthen walls to hold it back, would be nothing less than criminal foolhardiness. The best use we can make of the reservoir theory it to keep it to talk about.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask 10 minutes more.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, all of the engineers to whom I have submitted this question tell me they know of no feasible reservoir sites on the lower rivers, and all of them agree that levees, if built sufficiently strong, will give the needed protection.

Prof. Willis Moore, head of the Weather Bureau, was asked by me:

Do you know of any suitable reservoir sites that would store sufficient water to prevent floods on the lower Mississippi, or even appreciably diminish them, and, if so, where?

He answered:

No. The building of levees closed all the natural reservoir sites that had formerly been of assistance in taking care of surplus flood waters.

He doubtless alluded to the St. Francis basin.

The leading discussion on this subject was made by Col. H. M. Chittenden, of the United States Army Corps, which may be found in the proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers for September, 1908. He discusses the subject elaborately, and reaches the conclusion that reservoirs are not feasible for protecting the lower Mississippi River from floods.

The principal champion of reservoirs is Mr. M. O. Leighton, chief hydrographer of the United States Geological Survey. I wrote him on May 3 last asking a number of questions, and annex my letter and his reply thereto as Appendix D. It will be noticed that he argues very eloquently and forcibly for reservoirs, but says:

Personally, I believe that the entire system on both the Ohio and upper Mississippi could be established for about $500,000,000. If a suitable levee system could be established on the lower Mississippi for $60,000,000, as assumed in your letter, there would be no question concerning the propriety of adopting the levee plan if we considered that portion of the river and flood prevention alone. * * *

Summarizing the above, I would say that from the standpoint of the lower Mississippi alone the levee system is far preferable to the reservoir system as to cost and efficiency, but if the whole basin and the interests of all the people be considered, the reservoir system must be the final resort.

Let it be clearly understood that the friends of the levee system are not opposed to reservoirs and would gladly see them constructed wherever it is practical to place one. They realize that some help would come from any water that may be restrained. Their contention merely is that such reservoirs as can be constructed within the bounds of reasonable cost will not afford material relief, that the cost of anything like a complete system of reservoirs would be enormous, probably much in excess of half a billion dollars, and that levees so strong as to be impregnable can be built for less than one-tenth of the cost of the reservoir system. Of course, we would be glad to have both systems, and if the country ever becomes rich enough to construct reservoirs for the protection of both the upper and lower stretches of the rivers, for irrigating the lands thereon, for creating electric power, for assisting in navigation, and for any other purposes, we will gladly see it done, and certainly throw no obstacles whatsoever in the way. Personally, I would be glad to see a commission of five of the best engineers on earth created by Congress to study and report on flood prevention and control not only in the Mississippi Valley but throughout the Union, though I realize it would cost fully a million dollars and require several years to complete.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the Members of the House for their very patient and kind attention to me in this desultory discussion. I invite your earnest attention to the lower Mississippi and its riparian lands—in many respects the greatest river on our continent and well worth your study and interest. It was to obtain control of this mighty stream that Jefferson purchased Louisiana—the brightest jewel in our national diadem. The soil of its valley is described as the geological cream of the American Continent, the top dressing of leafy mold and rich loam washed from the hillsides and ravines of a hundred rivers and deposited by floods on the lands below. The control of these floods is a problem to which the greatest engineers have given their best attention for two centuries, and they are still studying it. This valley constitutes an empire in itself in area and national wealth. No equal part of the globe compares with it in resources and capacity for contributing to the food and clothing, the necessities and happiness of mankind. It certainly merits the fostering care of our national father. I beg of you to see that this care is given. [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE BOARD OF STATE ENGINEERS,
New Orleans, La., May 30, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RANSDELL: Referring to your letter of the 1st instant, I submit the following:

1. The cost of the levee system of Louisiana since 1865, as incurred by the State and levee districts, and the United States since 1882, is $49,100,951.57, of which $20,394,642 was contributed by the State, $15,949,494 by the levee districts, and $12,756,815 by the United States.

Inclosed is a tabulated statement showing the proportions, by periods, borne, respectively, by the State, levee districts, and the United States.

Now, it must be remembered that these figures represent only what has been paid out over the signatures of the State and United States engineers, and includes none of the many thousands of dollars from time to time additionally contributed by the parishes, municipalities, corporations (with special reference to the railroad companies), riparian owners, etc., which it is safe to say can not within the same time possibly have amounted to less than 50 per cent more, or, say, $25,000,000, the cost of the levee system in Louisiana since 1865 to date, therefore, aggregating not less than $75,000,000.

2. The aggregate of the authorized bonded indebtedness of the levee districts of the State is $8,570,000, of which $7,462,500 is at this time outstanding.

3. The cash outlay so far imposed upon the levee districts in consequence of the high water of 1912, estimated upon replies so far had from the districts, aggregates approximately $275,000.

4. Lives lost as a direct consequence of accidents due to crevasses and overflow, none. Several deaths from ill health previously contracted and later exposure did occur, but no authentic statement can really be made in regard thereto.

5. The loss of property in the overflowed area of Louisiana, including failure of crops, will probably aggregate $25,000,000.

6. The area of the alluvial lands subject to overflow in Louisiana is about 14,695 square miles, or about 9,404,800 acres. Of this, from such information as it has so far been possible to obtain, some 38 per cent was subjected to overflow from the high water of 1912. However, if the area that would under any circumstances have been overflowed from backwater and the failure of several of the levee systems to so far reach and protect said area be deducted, this percentage would be reduced to about 20 per cent.

In other words, of the percentage of the area of alluvial lands subject to overflow in Louisiana, overflowed by the high water of 1912, but 18 per cent should be directly charged to the breaches which occurred in the systems.

Again, the percentage of lands at large in Louisiana inundated by the high water of 1912 as compared with the total area of the State—about 45,500 square miles, or 29,120,000 acres—was but about 12 per cent.

In like manner, as above, deducting from this the area that would under any circumstances have been overflowed, as already explained, this percentage would, too, be reduced to about 6 per cent.

To separate the cultivated from the uncultivated area affected is at this time, with the data at hand, not possible.

* * * * * * *

On the score of the value of levees to Louisiana, it might not be uninteresting to note that in 1882 there were over 300 breaches in its lines of levees, the widths of which aggregated over 60 miles. In the year 1882 the assessed valuation of the State was $197,417,125.14. With each recurring season the lines of levees were so generally improved and the number of crevasses attendant upon succeeding high waters so materially reduced that for some 15 years back such a thing became of such rare occurrence and the uplifting of the State annually so responded to the growing sense of security from overflow and its far-reaching and harmful tendencies and effects felt that in 1911 the assessment of the State reached the sum of $546,820,340.

Of this advancement in and enhancement of values over three-fifths of it is embraced in property located in the alluvial lands of the State subject to overflow, still only tentatively protected from the ravages of caving banks and the high waters of the valley.

Reflect, then, as to the possibilities if means were only made available to mattress the caving bends and banks of the river, specially treat unstable foundations, and everywhere build the levees high enough and broad enough * * * say everywhere no less than 3 feet above the high water of 1912.

* * * * * * * *

With regard, and ever at your service, believe me, always,
Yours, very truly,
FRANK M. KERR,
Chief State Engineer.

APPENDIX B.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., June 4, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your inquiry of May 29, I will answer your questions as follows:

1. Area reclaimed by the work of the Reclamation Service is a little over 1,000,000 acres.

2. The works now partly completed will reclaim a total of nearly 3,000,000 acres.

3. The cost per acre has ranged from $22 to $93, for bringing water to the land, payable in 10 annual installments, the average cost not being far from $40 per acre.

4. The average cost to private landowner for carrying water to his land after the reservoirs and large irrigation canals have been built by the Government has been very small, as the distributing system to the vicinity of the private land has usually been built by the Government in connection with these larger works.

5. Upwards of $70,000,000 have been expended in building the large reservoirs, canals, and other structures for distributing water.

6. Expenditures are being made at the rate of a little less than $1,000,000 per month.

If the above replies do not cover fully your wishes, kindly let me know.

Very truly, yours,
F. H. NEWELL, Director.

APPENDIX C.

YAZOO-MISSISSIPPI DELTA LEVEE DISTRICT, OFFICE CHIEF ENGINEER,
Clarksdale, Miss., May 17, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have neglected to answer till now, your letter of May 4, asking for information and suggestions relating to the levees and the Mississippi River flood problem, as my attention has been quite fully occupied with the high water still hanging upon my hands.

I shall now endeavor to answer your interrogations categorically, to the best of my ability.

(1) "How long is it since there was a break in your district?"

Answer. Fifteen years.

(2) "What are the dimensions of your levees, and how do they compare with those in other districts?"

Answer. The Mississippi River Commission adopted a standard cross-section for levees, which has been in turn adopted by all the levee districts except the "Upper Yazoo" levee district.

The United States standard is as follows:

Crown width, 8 feet.
River-side slope, 3 to 1.
Land-side slope, 3 to 1, down to banquette; banquette grade, 8 feet below levee grade; banquette crown, 20 feet with a drop of 2 feet; banquette rear slope, 4 to 1.

The "Upper Yazoo" levee district adopted the following standard levee cross-section:

Crown width, 10 feet.
River-side slope, 3 to 1.
Land-side slope and rear banquette slope, 4 to 1.
Banquette crown, 40 feet wide, with a drop of 2 feet in 40.
(See inclosed diagram of cross-sections.)

Experience has taught me that 3 to 1 is too steep a slope for the land side of the levee, as it often invites and promotes sloughing of the rear slope. I have never had any sloughing on a 4 to 1 slope.

A 40-foot banquette serves four different functions, as, (a) reenforces the levee at the base, where the hydrostatic pressure is greatest; (b) covers with a superincumbent weight of earth the expanse immediately behind the levee, where foundation weakness is most likely to develop; (c) affords a ready supply of earth for high-water fighting when needed; and (d) by using 25 feet of the outer part of the banquette crown for a roadway, ready access is afforded to all parts of the levee line; and permitting its use as a public highway, under levee board control, has proven a valuable asset to the country at large.

(3) "If there had been no breaks elsewhere this year, do you believe the levees in your district would have withstood the floods?"

Answer. I believe my levee would have held the entire flood this year if there had been no breaks elsewhere; but it would have been at the expense of a long and costly battle, with the issue doubtful. This flood exceeded all previous calculations of ultimate flood elevations, and had all the water been confined between levees I should have had from 1.3 to 2.3 feet higher water than my grade line was intended to resist. I should not have expected weakness to develop in the levee itself, except for the necessity of "topping" some parts of the line with sacks; but a much greater hydrostatic strain on the foundation would have given much more trouble there. The grade line of this levee had been fixed to meet almost exactly the flood stages that were actually present, to wit, 54 feet on the Cairo gauge and 54.6 feet on the Helena gauge. Forty-four feet had been assumed as the ultimate maximum flood elevation at Memphis, and an abnormality there gave us on the upper end of the line, along Horn Lake, 3.55 feet higher water than the previous record stage. This was held, however, without any trouble.

The excess of this year's flood heights over previous floods was on the major portion of this levee from 2.50 to 3.55 feet; only a few miles had less excess than 2.5 feet. The levee proper showed no weakness and required no work. But a great deal of treacherous foundation exists in this district, which alone was the cause of trouble. Wherever such weakness had developed in former high waters permanent and effectual means were used to combat it, and those places caused no concern. But the increased strain due to greater pressure caused many "boils" to break out in new places, some of which appeared to be dangerous. These were all met promptly and kept under control.

(4) "If you answer 'No' to this question, how much higher would your levees have to be in order to withstand such floods as those of this year?"

Answer. My entire grade line must be readjusted for a new anticipated ultimate flood plane. This requires that it be raised from 2.5 to 3 feet in order to give a margin of 3 feet above the highest water, which I consider necessary for permanent security and confidence, which latter is an essential of perfect levee protection.

This will involve about 8,000,000 cubic yards of additional material, which, with increased unit prices for longer haul, will cost about $2,000,000.

(5) "What changes would you suggest in the present levee system, and what would be the approximate cost thereof?"

Answer. I would suggest that the larger cross section used in this district be substituted for the smaller section now in use elsewhere, and that the grade of all levees be made 3 feet above the ultimate highest water. The quantity of material in the larger section is 25 per cent greater than in the smaller. I would recommend that my standard "muck ditch" be used generally, to be enlarged in places, for special reasons. The standard is 12 feet top, 8 feet bottom width, 7.5 feet deep.

I would also recommend that wherever treacherous foundation has developed, or is suspected, that permanent "sublevees" be built around treacherous expanses behind the levee, and water ponded over same of sufficient depth to reduce the hydrostatic pressure to a harmless degree.

This recourse I have found is essential in this district, and indispensable for combating the only vulnerable feature of this levee system.

I have not sufficient specific information of the conditions prevailing in other levee districts to undertake an estimate of the cost of a perfected system of levees throughout the regions of overflow; but, as a rough, and perhaps generous, approximate, should say $40,000,000.

* * * * * * *

GENERAL REMARKS.

The overflowed lands of the lower Mississippi Valley can be protected from floods and fully reclaimed by an adequate system of levees, and by levees alone.

This is purely a question of cost, and of the scientific application of engineering skill.

The only remaining question is whether these lands are worth reclaiming at the price required.

The Hollanders have now on foot a project for reclaiming 478,000 acres from the sea at an estimated cost of $211 an acre. It is not claimed that the Holland land can be made to produce more to the acre than ours can.

While an adequate system of levees for the protection of this country from devastating floods is a manifest and prime necessity, it should not be lost sight of that the fundamental feature of Mississippi River control is bank revetment. Upon bank stability depends both ability to maintain levees and to perpetuate a system of protection by levees, and also the abatement of excessive flood elevations.

It would be unfortunate if the present excitement and enthusiasm which is directed toward renewed levee building should divert attention and effort from this basic necessity of river and flood control.

While the generosity or sense of obligation of the Federal Government may go to any lengths it pleases in providing money for the building and enlargement of the levees, it is, in my opinion, of the first and last importance that specific and certain provision of an unfailing and sufficient annual appropriation be made for bank revetment, and that by the act of appropriation such sum be made solely applicable to this purpose.

Very truly, yours,

T. G. DABNEY,
Chief Engineer Yazoo-Mississippi Delta Levee District.

APPENDIX D.

MAY 3, 1912.

Mr. M. O. LEIGHTON,
Chief Hydrographer, Geological Survey,
Department of the Interior.

MY DEAR MR. LEIGHTON: I am studying as carefully as possible all problems connected with the flood system of the Mississippi River. For years I have been a strong believer in the levee system, and see no reason to change even now in spite of the present awful disasters in the valley. If other means than levees can be adopted, however, I would gladly try them, for I realize that unless the levees are made very much stronger than at present they give only a partial measure of protection. You have been a student of reservoirs, and I wish you to write me clearly your ideas on the following points:

1. Is it possible to establish a reservoir system that would impound a sufficient amount of the flood waters of the tributaries of the Mississippi River as to afford much relief in times of great floods like the present?

2. If you answer "yes" to this question, please state specifically where these reservoirs should be located, and how many of them there should be, and what would be the approximate cost thereof.

3. In answering this question I trust you will bear in mind that the records of all floods with which I am familiar have come principally from the Ohio River and its tributaries, and especially the Allegheny, Cumberland, and Tennessee; from the upper Mississippi and its tributaries; from the Missouri River and its tributaries south and east of Sioux City; from the Arkansas, the Ouachita, the Red, and the Yazoo, with their tributaries.

4. It is estimated that the levee system can be made very much stronger than at present, some say sufficiently strong to withstand any floods for $30,000,000. If we assume that it will cost $60,000,000 to perfect the levee system and surely guard against any prospective floods, how would that compare with the cost of an effective system of reservoirs?

Earnestly hoping that you will reply as soon as convenient, and as fully as possible, and thanking you in advance, believe me, with highest esteem,

Very sincerely, yours,

JOS. E. RANSDELL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, May 4, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
House of Representatives.
(Through the Director, U. S. G. S.)

MY DEAR MR. RANSDELL: I take pleasure in submitting the following reply to your letter of May 3, relative to the practicability and efficiency of reservoirs in preventing disastrous floods in the lower Mississippi Valley.

It is important to emphasize at the beginning of any discussion of this kind that if the value of a reservoir system be appraised according to its benefits in any single respect, such as the prevention of floods, it will rarely occur that any reservoir proposal will stand the test of minute examination. It is equally true that when the appraisal of benefits is confined to one locality or one stretch of river, it will frequently appear that some other method of river control will be quite as efficient and less costly. The justification for any reservoir plan must consist of all the benefits that will be secured along the entire river's course from the dam sites to the sea. It must include, in addition to flood benefits, those of compensation of low-water flow for navigation, water power, and in some parts of the country for irrigation, and it should be mentioned incidentally that the irrigation benefits are not confined to the arid regions, for it is the belief of those who have given thought to the matter that one of the most marked developments in agriculture during the next generation will be the general adoption of irrigation in humid lands. Your inquiry relates to the single purpose of flood prevention and to that portion of the Mississippi below the mouth of the Ohio. Therefore any appraisal of the value of reservoir systems which is confined to that single benefit in that region alone can not fail to be prejudicial to the reservoir principle, and it would be a mistake to reject the reservoir policy on such a standard of efficiency measurement. Unless river control and development be considered as a unit project from source to mouth, and the general rather than the local benefits be placed foremost, it is not likely that reservoir systems will be widely adopted. The foregoing observations are made to qualify the following statements, which relate specifically to the subject of your inquiry.

It is impossible to establish a reservoir system that would impound a sufficient amount of flood water in the tributaries of the Mississippi to always prevent floods in that portion from Cairo to the Gulf. Levees will always be required in the delta country. Reservoirs will prevent great floods on the Ohio and the upper Mississippi, because there are in the tributaries of those two streams sufficient natural reservoir sites to accomplish the purpose. With such systems established floods on the lower Mississippi, which result from the high water on the Ohio and upper Mississippi, could be quite effectively prevented, though a system of low levees would undoubtedly be required at many places in the delta. In the Missouri basin there is a large natural reservoir capacity in the Rocky Mountain region, but this is not sufficient to prevent floods in the Missouri. There is an enormous Missouri drainage area consisting of the Plains country in Montana, the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, and Missouri, the run-off from which will in times of great precipitation, or in the event of quick melting of a large accumulated snowfall, create floods in the Missouri and consequently in the lower Mississippi. In the Arkansas basin there is very little reservoir capacity, even in the upper portion. Consequently the run-off from the large area in which there are no reservoir sites might produce floods in the lower Mississippi under the same conditions as above cited for the Missouri. A similar observation applies to the Red River, though to a relatively less extent. The records of past floods in the lower Mississippi indicate that the greater proportion of them have been the result of flood conditions in the Ohio, therefore the correction of floods in the latter stream would relieve the lower Mississippi from an equivalent proportion of its flood damage. Nevertheless the flood menace from the three western tributaries is so great that the levee system must be continued, though it is probable that with the Ohio and upper Mississippi under control a levee system of the present standard height and strength would be effectual. Without such control it is clear to everyone that the present levee system is inadequate. I believe that the foregoing covers points 1, 2, and 3 in your letter.

Concerning point 4: We do not know how much it would cost to secure reservoir control of the Ohio and upper Mississippi. The investigations of the Pittsburgh Flood Commission indicate that all except the very highest floods could be kept below the danger line at Pittsburgh by the expenditure of $20,000,000 for reservoirs in the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers. These reservoirs would, of course, have a beneficial effect all along the Ohio, but that effect would grow less as the distance below Pittsburgh increases. The cost of complete systems on such rivers as the Kanawha, Cumberland, Green, and Tennessee has not been determined. Personally, I believe that the entire system on both the Ohio and upper Mississippi could be established for about $500,000,000. If a suitable levee system could be established on the lower Mississippi for $60,000,000, as assumed in your letter, there would be no question concerning the propriety of adopting the levee plan if we considered that portion of the river and flood prevention alone. But if all the other benefits be taken into consideration throughout the entire country affected by the reservoir system, and if we charge off from the prospective cost of that system the cost of extra high and extra strong levees and the locks and dams, the need for which would be obviated in certain places, together with the cost of dredging, which under the present plan must be continued perpetually, and which under the reservoir plan would be obviated, the aforesaid prospective cost of $500,000,000 would be reduced in marked degree. But even if this were not so, a mature consideration of all the benefits of the reservoir system makes me confident that the people of the United States could make no more profitable investment than that required to build the reservoirs, even were the ultimate cost as large as $1,000,000,000.

Summarizing the above, I would say that from the standpoint of the lower Mississippi alone, the levee system is far preferable to the reservoir system as to cost and efficiency, but if the whole basin and the interests of all the people be considered, the reservoir system must be the final resort.

Very respectfully,

M. O. LEIGHTON,
Chief Hydrographer.

Approved, May 4, 1912.

GEO. OTIS SMITH, Director.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] whether, as a result of the conference between the Senate and the House, the $25,000 for the improvement of the Connecticut River above Hartford, which this House passed and which the Senate rejected, is now in the bill, or whether it stays out, as the Senate insisted it should?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The House conferees insisted upon that appropriation and the Senate yielded, and it is now in the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. I am very glad the House prevailed. I appreciate that this is a relatively small item and is not of much concern to the Members generally, but I think the history of it is intrinsically interesting and suggestive, and at the risk of being tedious, I wish to give a summary of it, for there is a widespread belief throughout the country that appropriations for rivers and harbors depend more on influence and pull than on their merits and that the members of the committee can secure for their districts any moderate appropriation which has a reasonable argument behind it. Here is a proposition which has been earnestly pushed by a member of this committee [Mr. LAWRENCE], now the senior Republican member, for 16 years, and yet by an extraordinary complication of delays and mishaps this appropriation of $25,000, which is only a drop in the bucket compared with what we need and ought to have, is the first we have obtained in all these years. I except surveys, for I think more money has been spent in surveying and planning than on any equal extent of river in the world; but this is the first amount given for actual improvement.

About halfway between the prosperous cities of Springfield and Hartford the Connecticut River falls rapidly for several miles over a rocky bed and thereby interrupts navigation, which now ends at Hartford, but which, if it were not for these rapids, could extend, with a depth of about 8 feet, to Holyoke, 8 miles above Springfield. Holyoke, Chicopee, Springfield, and the towns immediately tributary to them have a population well over 200,000. They are busy manufacturing centers which receive and send out enormous amounts of freight and would be peculiarly benefited by water transportation, and an 8-foot channel would be ample for freight boats.

Naturally the enterprising residents of this district have been irritated to see this splendid river flowing past their doors to the sea without carrying a ton of freight when cheap transportation was a crying need. They saw the Government spending large sums to develop streams insignificant compared with ours and watering much smaller communities, and the complaint naturally arose, Why should we not share in the appropriations lavished upon others apparently far less deserving?

This feeling inaugurated a movement back in 1873 which resulted in a survey of the river by Government engineers, but nothing more was attempted until about 1895. Business men took up the cause in earnest, and a society was organized to further navigation and cooperate with their Congressmen. The next year an appropriation was made by Congress for a survey and report, and the engineer in charge, Maj. Leach, made a report most favorable to our claims, recommending that the Government at once undertake the work and estimating that it would cost from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000. Maj. Leach had made no original soundings, and before the Government could adopt and commence the project an appropriation was necessary for the complete survey on which plans for the work could be based; but Maj. Leach's report had been so thoroughly favorable that we anticipated no obstacles and thought we were on the high road to immediate success.

Meanwhile an event occurred in Congress which proved in the end of great influence on our designs. Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, was appointed chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and those of you who have been here long enough to remember his predecessor will recall what a revolution he made in the methods of that committee. Before his time there was too much ground for the popular opinion that a Government appropriation was obtained by pull and not by merit, and that the bills were made up by giving appropriations to enough Members to secure a majority of votes without a very careful scrutiny of the relative needs of the different projects, and then the bill was rushed through with no opportunity for amendment and little debate. Under this arrangement every member of the committee was pretty sure to secure what he wanted for his own district. This was all changed under Mr. BURTON. He allowed unlimited debate and amendment, and to pass his bills relied upon his ability to satisfy the House in debate that the items were just and fair.

When our Connecticut River project was brought before this committee, with its new chairman, asking for an appropriation of $25,000 for a board of survey to make a thorough investigation upon which plans could be based, Mr. BURTON was unfavorably impressed by it and strongly opposed it in committee on the ground that Springfield and Holyoke had such exceptional railroad facilities that the saving in freight rates by navigation would not be enough to warrant the expense of the improvement; but after a hot contest we carried a majority of the committee and our clause was put in the bill, and the chairman, when the majority declared against him, acquiesced with good temper and made no further contest.

Then happened, however, the first of our many disappointments. The mill owners at Windsor Locks, who used as a sluiceway for their mills the existing canal, which was made for navigation and which the law compelled them to keep in condition for traffic, with the right to charge toll, were bitterly opposed to any scheme which threatened to take from them their profitable use of the water, and turned to their representatives in the Senate. Senator Platt, of Connecticut, was on the committee to which the House bill came, and without saying anything to our Senators he quietly persuaded his committee to drop our item from the bill. Senators Hoar and LODGE made a vigorous fight upon the floor of the Senate to restore the item, but were beaten by two votes, and so our chance was ended for that Congress, for there was only one river and harbor bill every two years.

In the next Congress we at once took the matter up, and our position was greatly strengthened by the appointment of Mr. LAWRENCE as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, for you all know even under the new practice each member of the committee has a peculiar advantage in securing appropriations for his district. The Connecticut River flows directly across the State of Massachusetts and is the dividing line nearly all the way between the first and second congressional districts, represented by Mr. LAWRENCE and myself, so that we were equally interested in the navigation problem, and securing a place on the committee for Mr. LAWRENCE seemed to make certain the successful result, which before was probable. Mr. LAWRENCE used his advantage so well and so gained the confidence of Chairman BURTON that while he still disapproved the project, he made no contest about it, and our appropriation again went into the bill and passed the House.

In the Senate the Connecticut Senators again opposed it and tried to defeat it, but this time they failed and we seemed certain of success until Senator Carter, of Montana, dissatisfied with some other provisions of the bill, successfully filibustered against it and made his famous speech of 13 consecutive hours, and thus the whole bill was killed. So we were obliged to wait once more for the next Congress.

This time the bill went through both House and Senate with a few unimportant amendments which the Connecticut Senators secured, and thus in 1902 we succeeded in getting a final survey ordered, for which we had struggled for six years. Maj. Leach's report had concurred so entirely with our wishes that we had little doubt that this board of Army officers would come to the same conclusions, and so we were stunned and our disappointment was bitter when in 1904 they reported that the probable benefits did not warrant the great outlay.

If this had happened under the old conditions, it would not necessarily have prevented the committee from deciding to undertake the work, particularly as this was the only project Mr. LAWRENCE, a member of the committee, ever asked for in his own district. But under the new régime it was fatal. The committee, under Mr. BURTON's lead, had adopted the ironclad rule that they would favor no measure which the Board of Engineers reported against.

And in this connection I wish to say that while this rule has worked most unfavorably to my district, while I believe that in this instance it has worked an injustice and has postponed a public improvement of inestimable value to an energetic and deserving community, yet nevertheless I still believe the rule is a wise one and, despite the injury it has done me, I would not favor its repeal and a return to the old practice of favoritism and logrolling. The officers of the Army are not infallible. They are likely now and then to make mistakes, as I think they did in this instance, but I have never heard their integrity or qualifications questioned. They are not subject to political influence and are universally admitted to act from pure motives, and it is but fair to them that I should express my recognition that their opposition to this project, like Chairman BURTON'S, was occasioned by no prejudice or improper influence, but by their honest sense of duty, mistaken though I think they were.

When that board of engineers made its report against us a new rivers and harbors bill had been nearly completed, and Mr. LAWRENCE and I, staggered by this unexpected blow, had to consider how our project could be revived. We concluded that the best chance to save something from the wreck and evade the result of the unfavorable report was to try to insert in the new river and harbor bill a provision that the board which had just reported against us should be reconvened and should submit an additional report upon any other methods of making the river navigable, for we had reason to believe that board might favor some project not providing so deep a channel or requiring so large an expenditure as we had demanded. We succeeded in inserting such a provision in the bill, and it happened at just that time our Connecticut friends who had always opposed us were very anxious that the magnificent Hartford Bridge under construction should be built without a draw. That we had always objected to and prevented, but it would not interfere with our light-draft 8-foot navigation under this new project, so we submitted it to the managers of the navigation association at home, and under their instructions we came to an agreement with the Hartford Representatives and Senators that we would permit their bridge to be built without a draw and they should cooperate with us in opening the river to Holyoke.

But this new plan broke against the same obstacle which had halted us before, and the board of engineers reported against even this limited freight navigation. There was left us now only one loophole against complete and final failure, and that was not a hopeful one. It consisted in an appeal to the Board of Review. This permanent board of engineer officers, sitting at Washington, had been created, I always believed, to act as a still finer sieve through which doubtful projects must pass after they had been allowed by the local surveying board, and I do not think they had ever allowed a plan which the first board rejected, but had rejected many which the first board allowed, but it was our only chance, we were convinced of the justice of our case, so we appealed, and the Board of Review, after many hearings, justified us by overruling the previous decision, and deciding that the results of the improvement would justify the expenditure by the Government of a million and a half dollars, but that certain rights at Windsor Locks must first be ceded to the United States. This the owners refused to do, and we found it would require litigation and expense, and it was being considered by influential citizens when the hopes and efforts of many of the men who had been most active for navigation were directed to a new channel.

The fall of the river near Windsor which makes the rapids and obstructs navigation, at the same time creates a vast water power, only a fraction of which is used at Windsor Locks. It occurred to some of the enterprising men who were studying the subject that instead of asking the Government to build a dam for navigation as planned, they might build the dam themselves and thereby develop a large and valuable water power, and by utilizing their dam the Government with the million and a half which it was willing to spend could easily provide the lock and dredging necessary for navigation. The recent discovery that power can be carried long distances by wire has brought to notice many possible water powers before neglected, and this undeveloped and wasted fall of water, halfway between the two industrial centers of Springfield and Hartford, appealed to some of the men who were earnestly and unselfishly working for navigation as an opportunity to accomplish that end and at the same time to make a profitable investment. They felt that these rapids were, to use the famous phrase of Dr. Johnson two centuries ago, not a mere fall of water, but the potentiality of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. So they appealed to Congress for a charter and for permission to develop water power by a dam which should be so constructed as to furnish with the Government's cooperation the long sought navigation.

This development of water power in navigable streams and the cooperation of the Government and private parties is one of the most important of the questions before Congress. It is quite new because until the discovery of how to transmit power great distances most of these water powers were valueless. I know you gentlemen on the Interstate Commerce Committee and Rivers and Harbors Committee are giving it close study, and I hope you will soon agree upon some general principle applicable to all cases, so that the men wanting to invest their money in such enterprises can begin active cooperation, and more than all so that the navigation projects depending on it can be completed.

The Commerce Committee of the Senate last winter gave a hearing to the parties seeking this charter at Windsor Locks, and influential members of the committee stated publicly during the hearings that while they could not yet tell on what terms the charters would be granted, one fact was certain—that they must provide adequately and unequivocally for the full needs of navigation. And the prospect at last seems excellent that this long-deferred project will soon be developed in the most satisfactory and thorough way.

It was curious and, I thought, significant that at this hearing certain parties at Windsor Locks who have always sneered at navigation and opposed and blocked it in every possible way suddenly became its ardent champions, put in for themselves a rival application for a charter, and were eager to promise everything which the most ardent navigationist could desire. It showed that the cause was progressing; that its necessity was admitted by its bitterest enemies; but it also complicated the situation, because with two parties bidding for the right to build the dam, the committee was uncertain on which to bestow the charter. So that their new profession of zeal for navigation is causing us as much delay as their hostility ever did.

While this contest for the charter has been going on a company in Springfield which anticipates great advantage from river navigation determined to experiment with the present conditions on the river and to bring up coal by boat from the Sound. They found many obstructions, snags, and sand bars between Hartford and Windsor Locks, but by indefatigable perseverance succeeded in bringing up a flotilla of coal barges to their docks in Springfield. They wish to continue the operation, and it is to remove the obstructions to their commerce that the $25,000 in this bill is appropriated. Their enterprise certainly deserves recognition. It is peculiarly gratifying to us who are interested to see that there is actually some commerce on the river, even if it is small and continued under difficulties. It is an earnest of what may be in the near future, and I was exceedingly glad that the engineer officers could be persuaded to recommend this $25,000 on the ground that it not only helped the navigation now on the river but was a necessary part of the larger improvements which we expect will give us general navigation.

It is the first money that has been appropriated in all these years really for the improvement of the river. All the rest has been for surveys and investigation, and although this amount is insignificant the circumstances are favorable; for unless the engineers expected that the larger plan of a power dam—in conjunction with which they have recommended that the United States should spend over a million dollars—for navigation was imminent and likely to soon be developed, they would hardly have been allowed this money simply to restore old conditions. This $25,000 is to be so expended that it will be part of the anticipated navigation. To bring that about we are no longer dependent on the decision of an engineer board, for they have already reported favorably upon it. It awaits now the action of the men who avow that they are ready to begin the enterprise. They say the money is at hand. They have their private selfish interest to stimulate them, and the only obstacle which is delaying us is that the scheme looks so attractive that two rival companies are stretching for it and fighting each other, and until their legal contest is ended or compromised neither can begin. I am hoping that this new hindrance will be soon disposed of, and that the project which has cost so much effort with so little result for so many years is about to be consummated in a more enduring and satisfactory form than any of the first plans.

I had no intention of taking so much time on this subject, which is of more local interest to my district than of general interest, but I am glad of the opportunity to give a connected statement of our efforts for the navigation of our principal New England river, and I think it may also be useful as contradicting the current impression that pull and political influence are all that can gain appropriations. Undoubtedly they still avail, and without work and influence no appropriations will be won; but the old times when the least meritorious project could be carried through by an influential Congressman on the committee regardless of its merits have passed away never, I hope, to return. Here is a case where a member of the committee sought for 16 years one solitary appropriation for his district, and though in that time he went from the foot to the top of the committee he could never succeed, simply because the Army engineers who were ordered again and again to investigate as often reported that the improvement though desirable would not warrant the necessary expense.

And the present situation is also of general interest as an indication of the new opportunities the transmission of power over long distances by wire has given both to the United States and to remote localities. Now, the innumerable dams which the Government has constructed and maintained for navigation purposes can, with little additional expense, become great sources of valuable salable power, and in future development private corporations will be glad, for their own profit, to build the dams necessary to make streams navigable and thus save the Government vast expense.

We should speedily adopt principles and rules under which such corporations may act, and I trust one of the first results of this new discovery and new policy may be a huge dam at Windsor Locks, which will distribute power and add to the development of that whole region, and, more important yet, will at last open up navigation to the Sound from that busy industrial center which for so many years has seemed on the point of securing the advantages of river transportation and each time has had its expectations rudely shattered by the veto of the War Department. The War Department has now reported in favor of this new project, capital is ready, two different corporations are contesting for the privilege, and I trust this rivalry may soon be settled, the necessary charter granted, and the long-postponed navigation at last consummated.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I favor the adoption of the conference report. There are several items in the bill which are of great interest to the people whom I have the honor to represent, and I desire to take this opportunity to express my gratification that the bill is soon to become a law, and in doing so I feel called upon to express the appreciation of the people of my district for the consideration shown them as evidenced by several items in this measure.

After a struggle lasting many years, at times presenting many discouragements, the people, not only of my district, but of the whole State of California, will be gratified to realize that provision is made for the improvement of the harbor at Monterey, Cal. The State of California, with its immense coast line, has long been anxious for more harbors, and the inauguration of the project at Monterey, which will result in an additional deep-water harbor on the Pacific coast, will, I am sure, be received with genuine satisfaction by the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. The making available of this splendid deep-water harbor by the building of a breakwater is destined to play an important part in the commercial development of our State. It means the certain construction within the near future of a cross-State railroad which will be built from the great San Joaquin Valley to the harbor at Monterey. It means an additional outlet for the products of the greatest producing section of the State of California.

Provision is made for the building of a breakwater at Monterey, at a cost of $800,000, upon two conditions—first, that the State of California shall provide $200,000 toward the cost thereof, which condition has already been met by a direct appropriation of the Legislature of the State of California; and, second, upon condition that provisions are made satisfactory to the Secretary of War for the building of a railroad from the San Joaquin Valley to Monterey, which condition, in my opinion, will be met within the near future. This cross-State railroad from the great interior valley of California will carry to tidewater the products of as rich a section as there is in the world, a section of our State which, in the variety of its products, is unsurpassed; a section which produces every known product of the soil and of the mountains immediately adjoining—the richest products of the forest and mine.

The building of the railroad to this newly constructed harbor means a cheaper outlet by reason of the short haul and the consequent decreased freight rate for the lumber and mineral products of our mountains and for all the products of the great valley, including wheat, barley, oats, hay, alfalfa, dairy products, dried fruits, canned fruits, raisins, citrous fruits, wine, and every product of the farm and of the soil. It marks, in my opinion, a new era in the development and prosperity of the State of California.

I am also pleased to know that the conferees have included in the bill amendment No. 119 of the Senate, which is in the following language:

That a preliminary investigation be made to determine whether a system of impounding reservoirs at the headwaters of the Allegheny, Monongahela, and Ohio Rivers and their tributaries is needed and practicable to provide sufficient water during dry seasons to operate the present and proposed system of locks and dams in these rivers, and to what extent the Federal Government, on the basis of their benefit to navigation, is justified in cooperating with local communities which may be interested in the construction of such reservoirs primarily for the purpose of flood prevention, and the feasibility of operating such reservoirs for the double purpose of flood prevention and improving navigation; and that this investigation be conducted by a board of three engineer officers, to be designated by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army; and that the results of this investigation be reported to Congress, with such additions as may be made thereto by the said Chief of Engineers, not later than December 7, 1912; and that for this purpose the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

Personally I would like to see this amendment go further. However, I realize that this amendment is a new departure in legislation and a recognition of a very important policy, which policy, I trust, will be enlarged and broadened within the near future. The Nation must take a further step in its legislative policy with regard to the waters of our rivers. It must be recognized by advanced legislators that there should be inaugurated a policy of cooperation between the Nation, the State, individuals, and local communities looking toward the conservation of the waters of our streams and a utilization of such waters to beneficial use. To this end there must be inaugurated within the near future a policy which will build storage reservoirs upon the headwaters of our rivers so that these reservoirs may furnish water for the standardization of our navigable streams; and, furthermore, to the end that such waters so stored may be brought to beneficial use in the irrigation of lands which can not be profitably cultivated without irrigation.

A wise progressive policy makes it incumbent upon the Nation to lead the way in legislation which will bring about this cooperative policy of conservation. The provision above quoted, I sincerely trust, is the beginning of a liberal policy which will bring into active cooperation the Nation, the State, and the local community in the wise use of the water of our various streams. It is foolish to further postpone such a policy. It is, to my mind, not only foolish, but it is extravagantly wasteful to continue to do nothing because of a lack of cooperation between these agencies. There has been too great an insistence by Congress that it will do nothing with our streams except to promote navigation. We must recognize that the problems of navigation, flood prevention, storage, and irrigation are so interwoven and so overlap that it is positively essential that the Nation, the State, the individual landowner, and the local community must cooperate, and in this cooperation it is, to my mind, the positive duty of the Nation to lead the way.

We have a situation in the State of California which demands that this cooperative policy be immediately inaugurated. The complete use of the waters of the San Joaquin River and the Sacramento River demands the entering upon this policy without further delay. I am, therefore, gratified that there is such a recognition of this policy contained in this bill, and the friends of this policy will continue this agitation until a full recognition of the policy is obtained and its inauguration recognized by law.

After many years of effort we have, with the active cooperation of the commercial bodies of the great San Joaquin Valley, particularly the traffic association of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Fresno, succeeded in enlisting the attention of the authorities of the United States to the problems of the San Joaquin River. We have obtained for this river greater consideration from the Engineer's Office of the Government than ever before, and we have brought these problems to a further point looking toward their solution than has hitherto been attained. The problems of this great river demand the building of storage reservoirs upon the headwaters of its tributaries in order that the stream may be standardized for the purpose of flood prevention, navigation, irrigation, and drainage. The improvement of this river by a cooperative policy between the Nation, the State, and the communities tributary to it will be of inestimable value and will result in unprecedented development.

The people whom I have the honor to represent are so deeply concerned in the utilization of the water of the San Joaquin River for the purpose of irrigation and navigation that they will not rest until the river is comprehensibly improved and its water put to all the possible beneficial uses which a wise system of conservation demands.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I have neither the time nor the disposition to detain the House or to delay the vote upon this important measure by a lengthy discussion of its provisions, but only desire to express my approval of this bill as a whole and especially to express my own appreciation and the thanks of the constituency that I represent for the liberal spirit shown by the River and Harbor Committee and by this Congress in favorably considering matters of such great importance to the people of the Mississippi Valley. This bill appropriates

$6,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to the mouth of the Mississippi, $4,000,000 of which will be expended in repairing and constructing levees from Cape Girardeau, Mo., south. This is much more than was ever before appropriated by any Congress for the same purpose.

The recent unprecedented flood from the Mississippi River and the great destruction of life and property wrought by it has convinced us all of the necessity and the importance of this increased appropriation.

There is but one criticism that I would make of the past or present policy of this Government in handling the Mississippi River question, and that is I believe more money should be expended in revetment work, making the banks of the river permanent, and thereby protecting the levees from destruction by caving banks and at the same time protecting the channel of the river from the obstruction that necessarily follows the falling in of acres of the most fertile lands under the sun.

As a near neighbor of Cairo, Ill., residing as I do in the Missouri county immediately across the Mississippi River, I heartily approve of the appropriation contained in this bill for the protection of that growing city and important commercial center, and I congratulate my old-time friend, Capt. THISTLEWOOD, who represents that district so well, for his success in obtaining this just recognition for his city.

I also desire to express my approval and appreciation of the item in this bill providing for the examination and survey of the St. Francis River in Missouri, which the committee kindly placed in the bill at my request.

The Government for many years appropriated money to improve this river, but in the Fifty-ninth Congress, which was before I had the honor to be here, the usual appropriation for this river was discontinued; and I now hope, by this examination and survey, to again get this important local stream restored to its former place as a recognized navigable river.

Mr. Speaker, I favor this bill, and as it is important that levee work should be done at once, so as to protect the country from another possible flood, I hope it will be promptly passed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] has two minutes remaining. Does he desire to use that time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, has a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors who is not a member of the conference committee any time at his disposal? The gentleman from North Caroline [Mr. SMALL] wanted to be recognized. I am willing to yield to him the two minutes I have left if that will answer his purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for one hour.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. THISTLEWOOD].

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is no section of the country, outside of the section immediately surrounding the city of Cairo, that suffered more from the great flood that visited that western section during March and April of this past year. There is no section of the country that needs the protection that only the United States Government can give to its rivers by the building of levees and of revetment work more than this section.

The city of Cairo is most peculiarly situated, being at the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers; two great rivers within themselves that drain with their tributaries more than 27 States. But when you remember that to the Ohio River, not more than 50 miles above Cairo, is added the Cumberland River and the Tennessee River, and a short distance above, the Wabash, in my judgment these three rivers combined discharge more water into the Ohio than comes from the upper Mississippi. And there is some peculiarity about the rapid rise that prevails when these rivers are at flood stage. In 1883 we had the highest water at Cairo ever known since the Government established the Weather Bureau, yet the water of this great flood that has just passed or is passing exceeded the height of that flood by 2 feet; but in the year 1884, making three high-water periods—1882, 1883, and 1884—the Ohio River was 3½ feet higher at Paducah than it was in 1883, the highest water for Cairo up to that period. This great flood that has passed or is passing was 2 feet higher at Cairo than was the flood of 1884, but yet not so high at Paducah, 25 miles above. This recent flood, I think, was the most destructive flood that ever visited the valley of the Mississippi River. The loss of lumber, buildings, corn, hay, alfalfa, wheat, live stock, and other farm products would perhaps amount to $5,000,000 alone in and around Cairo, and that was not the greatest loss. If you could have been with me on that April morning when the Big Four levees gave way, and could have seen, as I saw, streams of people deserting their little cabins with fear and alarm depicted on their countenances, you would know how to appreciate the loss to those poor people who were driven from the drainage district. It was a loss including not only their household furniture, their family supplies, but even their houses were beaten to pieces by the raging waters. What could be more distressing than to see a poor woman with her house about to be swept away, all that she had right there, and perhaps with two or three little children who had become greatly alarmed clinging to her in great fear? I refer to the people who were driven from this drainage district, the workshop of the city of Cairo. They are the laboring classes of people, but they are the producing class, working in the mills and shops and factories, and while their loss was not great, yet in proportion to their ability to meet the loss, it was greater than all the others. The wonder to me is that so few of them lost their lives, but this question can only be explained by the fact that the river rises gradually at first, giving the people a chance to escape by dikes and railroad tracks, and those that were left clung to their buildings, some of them taking refuge in attics until they were picked off by rivermen in skiffs. Is it any wonder that people become alarmed and is it surprising in times of great calamity like this that people are willing to open their pocketbooks and come to the relief of those who have had everything swept away?

While we do not ask any of this appropriation that is allotted to Cairo for the purpose of making restoration, or the rebuilding of homes for the people who lost all, we do ask it that the people may be safeguarded in the future against such losses; that labor may be furnished to them that they may take care of themselves. Without this appropriation from the National Government it is doubtful if we could do this work ourselves. This flood, while it was resisted by the main part of Cairo, entirely suspended traffic, destroyed railroad embankments and bridges, and nearly all means of communication between the high land and the city of Cairo. I think one dollar expended in building up levees good and strong goes further in the end than two dollars expended in temporarily caring for the people. The American people are very charitable, and they rush with open pocketbooks to assist the distressed communities. They are willing to provide for them, but is it not better for the Government to make these appropriations so that this distressing condition will not be likely to occur again?

I think with the $250,000 that you will vote in this bill and the $250,000 that will be raised by the citizens of Cairo, the $20,000 at Mound City with a like amount to be expended by them, we will be able to put the levees surrounding this territory in shape to withstand a much larger flood than this one was. I do not think it would be prudent to say that with this we could bid defiance to the floods in the future. The possibility of floods in the Mississippi Valley is great, and where great rivers come together and where the outlets have been narrowed during high-water periods, it is apt to be many days before the river declines perceptibly. What is the means of protection? I know of nothing else than well-constructed levees built high and wide and strong. I can not say too much about what has been done under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission on the lower part of the river and even above Cairo. If by revetment work or any means we could stop the caving banks along the Mississippi River, we would go a long way in arresting the great and destructive floods. Where the banks cave the earth is carried in sediment but a short distance down the river and deposited again, making an obstruction to navigation and an obstruction to the rapid flowing of the stream. The caving banks are largely where the trouble comes from in filling up the channel of the stream. Wherever there is a caving bank there is sure to be a sand bar but a short distance below it, and there cross currents are caused in the river which in turn starts a cut in another place. I think the engineers who have studied the Mississippi River believe in letting the channel scour out the stream where it can be done and thus make a greater width to the river and to the flow of water in flood times. I would apply two remedies to this condition of the river: Build up the levees and maintain the channel as free from sand bars as it is possible to do. There is not any question but that the bars in the channel of the river have a great deal to do with the stage of the river at all times.

Most of the people who lost their homes and their all in the flooded district were cared for by the citizens of Cairo and of the surrounding country, aided by patriotic National and State Governments. I feel sure that many of them have not gotten back into their own homes yet. We need this appropriation well expended, and I hope that no time will be lost in closing the gaps that were made by this great flood in and around the city of Cairo.

The question was asked by the gentleman from Washington if there had ever been any money appropriated for improvements on the Ohio River. My recollection is it was not answered, but I remember very distinctly only a few years ago, less than 20, the old town of Shawneetown was nearly wiped away in a great and destructive flood, and the people of the West, especially the Central West, contributed largely to the maintenance of the people who were driven from their homes, and the Government made an appropriation to build and restore their levees which were broken or destroyed.

I believe in levee building. I believe it is the only way the destructive floods can be prevented from doing great damage. The question is often raised why the river increases in height as the years go by during these great floods. If there were no other reason to cite, the very fact that great stretches of territory are being leveed and the water is year by year confined to narrower channels than prevailed years ago. It is not a new thing, Mr. Speaker, for the Government to appropriate money to build levees. The Mississippi River Commission has been in existence for more than 30 years, and a large part of its business year by year has been the building of levees and the closing of gaps along the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Then years ago levees were built opposite the city of Cairo in Missouri, partly by the Government and partly by the levee district, I think, on a half-and-half basis, and this is what the city of Cairo is proposing. We are only asking that the Government shall contribute one-half of this levee enterprise, and I feel that the money will be returned in increased business of the country, increased property interest fourfold to the Government within 10 years. The Government has property of its own in the city of Cairo. They have a Federal building and custom-house which cost in the neighborhood of half a million dollars. They have a marine hospital that cost over $100,000. The Government has large interests in Cairo. It is the head of deep-water navigation. The Government gauge at Cairo is a guide to all the points below us as to the height the river may be expected to rise during any flood and is watched as carefully by the planters around Vicksburg and Greenville and other places along the river as are their own reports. It is a wonderful help to the farming community. It is a great help to the business interests to have this Government river report made daily so that each can calculate and take chances for himself. So this is no new departure for the Government. They have been building levees, or helping to build them, ever since the organization of the Mississippi River Commission, and in some places they build them outright.

This land, embracing the Mississippi Valley, cared for, is the most productive of all land, in my judgment, in the world; and any government would be very neglectful of its duties to its citizens and be wasteful and destructive of its own resources that would permit this great body of land to lie idle because of the expenditure of a few million dollars in levee building. I make no special plea for the city of Cairo beyond the surrounding country. I am just as anxious to see the people of Mr. RUSSELL'S district in Missouri, that is right across the river from us, protected from the flood waters. They are entitled to be protected. They are entitled to have their bank revetments made; and I am sure Mr. RUSSELL, a very active and influential Congressman, will see that the levees on his side are restored and built stronger and higher. Of course all this will be forcing the water up on us, but we are not so selfish as to want to receive all the benefits that levee protection gives to any other section. This is a great country, and this Mississippi Valley is a great body of land. It is said a man is a benefactor who causes two blades of grass to grow where one used to grow. The improvement of this great body of semioverflowed land will do more than to cause two blades of grass to grow; it will cause four. I think we have just begun to reclaim the Mississippi Valley.

There is one thing to be remembered by those who live along small inland streams—the necessity for levee improvement does not there exist for the reason that the water in such streams rises rapidly and soon passes, doing little damage; but when these great rivers fill up, you may calculate that you have a month's water on your hands to carry off. The ordinary outlets of the river are not sufficient to carry it off. If rivers were only intended to be used to drain off the surplus water from the land, there would be, perhaps, as much necessity for their improvement as there is to-day, but the Mississippi River is a great freight carrier. The Mississippi River and the Ohio River combined annually transport many millions of tons of coal, iron, grain, lumber, and all the products which enter into the trade of the country. I have in mind now the immense carrying capacity of some of the coal boats that are running on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. The great towboat Sprague, in her record-breaking trip down the river, towed 56 barges of coal, of 1,200 tons each, or a total of 67,200 tons. If this coal had been loaded on cars, of 30 tons to the car, it would have extended, coupled up in a solid train, over more than 20 miles of road. The tow, when placed on the river, was 900 feet long and more than 300 feet wide. It only shows the possibility of the Mississippi river as a great freight carrier and freight regulator. I am told that coal can be profitably towed from Pittsburgh to New Orleans on the river now for 75 cents per ton, whereas the cheapest rail rates would be perhaps three times as much. All of this great carrying capacity ought to be used by the Government as much as possible, and one of the reasons why it is not used more, perhaps, is the uncertainty of having a stage of water that will permit of river traffic the year round. If the conditions of the river could be improved to such an extent that we could have every-day transportation, so that a man's property would not be going to waste, or he would not be eating up what he had earned during the period of fair weather and good river conditions, it would be a great and valuable asset to the Government, much more valuable than it is now.

We need to care for the river. We need to protect its banks. We need to prevent the formation of bars, if possible. We need to so manage the river that we can have this transportation, if not all the year, then as nearly so as possible. To do this we must use the river. To do this we must stimulate the raising of products along its banks. We must stimulate the growth of business in and along the river. There is no soil in the world that will produce as much if properly managed as does the bottom lands of the Mississippi. The Mississippi Valley, of which the Mississippi River is the great central figure, produces 75 per cent of the wheat, oats, corn, barley, cotton, live stock, hay, fruits, and other commodities of the United States; and while much is lost through overflow, if the Government will take hold of it and expend annually a sufficient sum to restore the broken levees and to raise those that are not sufficiently high we would hear but little of the loss and destruction of property along its banks. The State of Mississippi, I am told, has the best levee system of any of the Southern States. As an evidence of that fact no breaks occurred in any of its levees this year. They have made it a business to build them high, strong, and to care for them, and under their efficient management it is returning fourfold the money invested.

I do not hesitate to say that the destruction of property measured in dollars and cents, saying nothing about the loss of life, is equal to a sum that if properly expended would make the levees of the Mississippi River almost impregnable and render life and property behind its banks secure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to make two observations in respect to this bill. First, as to the Mississippi River and the great valley which it drains. I wish to bring to the attention of the House a broad aspect of that subject in order that some plan may be devised by Congress which will avoid the necessity of constant criticism annually levied at the appropriation for that river, as has been the case for many years. Any man who studies the Mississippi River in his first experience with it as a river-and-harbor project will of necessity be prejudiced against it because of the small number of water carriers which traverse it, and the small amount of commerce which is carried upon it, and the slight degree to which its navigability is affected, as compared with the large appropriations which are made for it. I say these considerations together will prejudice the mind of a man who first begins the study of this river in order to determine its merits as a project worthy of improvement. However, in another aspect, when it is considered that from Cape Girardeau to its mouth at the Gulf there is concentrated the drainage of almost one-half in area of our territory, a condition which was so happily explained by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] in his interesting speech, and when the conditions resulting from this great volume of water upon the riparian lands are considered, the fertility and value of those lands, the large population and the wealth of that section, and when we consider, further, that of necessity it is not a local question, is not confined to any State, and is beyond the potential and financial power of any State or of even any section of the Union to take care of, I say we can not avoid the conclusion that it is a project involving national consideration and demanding Federal support.

We have been making appropriations for this great river, particularly for levees and revetment and bank protection, from Cape Girardeau to the Gulf, for a number of years. The expenditures in a large degree are made and the plans formulated by the Mississippi River Commission; but we have never had and have not to-day any plan by which there is a definite cooperation between the States and the localities along that river and the Federal Government. There is no coordination between the engineers and other assistants furnished by States with the Federal Government. I do not believe that this problem will be properly settled until after due consideration Congress shall enact a law under which the proportion which the States and the Federal Government must contribute shall be established upon some uniform and equitable basis. I believe we should go further and place the entire project under the control of the United States Army engineers, and thereby place the entire responsibility upon them. I think no higher duty can devolve upon the River and Harbor Committee and the friends of the Mississippi River, particularly in its lower section, than to devise some plan for submission to Congress by which this shall be recognized as a great national problem and a national duty, so that each year we may make appropriations upon some equitable scheme of cooperation between the Federal Government and the States of the section immediately affected.

I wish to make only one further observation, Mr. Speaker. I think in many respects this is one of the most valuable bills which has been brought to the House in the new and constructive legislation which it contains. I have only the time to review now one feature.

Criticism is made from time to time by opponents of river and harbor improvement, who say that the expenditures which we make do not develop a sufficient amount of commerce upon our navigable rivers commensurate with the money expended. To some extent this criticism is justified and merited, and it is due to our relying too largely upon the proposition that an improved channel means commerce. It means no such thing. Other conditions must exist before commerce may be expected to develop upon any navigable stream. One of the conditions I wish to advert to for a moment is this: We must have upon our navigable streams adequate water terminals. One of the difficulties in promoting commerce upon our interior rivers, and notably more on the rivers in the Mississippi Valley, tributary to the great Mississippi, has been this lack of adequate water terminals, not only a terminal which shall have sufficient area, but which shall have a modern warehouse equipped with all modern appliances for transferring freight from the water carrier to the warehouse. There must be physical connection between the water terminal and the railroads serving that community or section, and also adequate highways leading to the terminal. Then we should go further, as we have attempted to do in the Panama Canal bill, and compel a system of prorating between the railways and the waterways, so that we may have long-distance shipments, partly by rail and partly by water. It is recognized to-day that one of the principal factors in our success in building up so great a railway transportation system lies in the fact that the railroads have standardized their tracks and equipment and by prorating one with another have built up a system of long-distance traffic so that they embrace the entire country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, if prorating in this way has enabled the railways to build up long-distance traffic, serving the needs of the entire country, why should they not also prorate with the water carriers, and why should not a person having freight for shipment which may be carried partly by water and partly by rail be able to obtain a through contract of carriage so that it may be carried upon both lines and under one common contract or bill of lading?

Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a provision that in every survey authorized in this and in subsequent bills the engineers shall make a report indicating whether there are water terminals, whether they are adequate; if there are water terminals which are not adequate, they shall specify the particulars in which they are inadequate, and, in addition, if there are no water terminals whatever they shall indicate in a general way the proper location of such terminals and the necessity for them. This information will gradually tend to induce Congress to provide that no appropriations shall be available until the States or municipalities shall construct adequate terminals. In my opinion, this would be a just condition. No section is entitled to have a stream or harbor improved, unless they intend to utilize it for commerce, and to this end water terminals are a prerequisite. Not only is that provision in this bill, but there is another even broader, which authorizes and directs the Chief of Engineers during 1912 and 1913 to secure data embracing every navigable stream and harbor in the United States, which has at any time been improved by the Federal Government, and furnish for the information of Congress full data as to the existence or nonexistence of water terminals upon each of those navigable streams and harbors. When that report shall have been submitted and we shall have attached to every subsequent report full information as to the existence of water terminals, then the committee and Congress will be in a position to enforce, if it chooses to do so, the limitation upon appropriations for a navigable stream, requiring that water terminals must be provided before the appropriation shall become effective. In many other respects this bill is exceedingly meritorious, but I shall not attempt to detain you longer with any details as to its merits.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to applying it to all who have spoken?

Mr. MANN. None whatever; and I ask that it may apply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no one objects, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the river and harbor appropriation bill as it passed the House carried a cash appropriation of $24,062,520.50, and provided for a continuation of contracts in the amount of $2,200,000, or an aggregate amount of $26,262,520.50. That was considered a rather small amount for a river and harbor bill, and we were told that was a result of the Democratic economy plan to cut off all appropriations. If anything was added, the responsibility was to be placed upon the Senate. The Senate added to the bill by amendment $8,054,010 and struck out $233,000, making a net increase of $7,821,010. The total of the bill as it went to conference was $34,083,530.50. The Senate added items of $8,054,010, and the conferees have made a net reduction of all of those items of $824,160—about 10 per cent. The bill in its present form as agreed to by the conferees carries $33,259,370.50. I do not know whether the conferees are quite willing to say that all of these items are proper and should be in the bill or whether we shall hear during the campaign how the House passed an appropriation bill carrying so much and the extravagant Senate added so much and then forced the House to agree to put on those items in order to carry on the Government.

I suppose we will hear that a great many times during the campaign, and yet no man here to-day dares say that any of the items which the Senate added to the bill and which have been agreed to in conference are not proper items to be in the bill. If there is any such man here I will yield him time now to point out the items. Mr. Speaker, the Senate also added to this bill an amendment as section 2 of the bill providing:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall cause the Chief of Engineers of the Army and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to report to Congress, in which shall be included a preliminary report not later than December 1, 1912, upon the saving, as well as other advantages, which can be accomplished by the adoption of the continuing contract system, the rapidity with which projects should be completed, upon methods of standardization by which the waterways of the country may be improved uniformly in proportion to their capacities and to the existing or probable demands of general commerce, and also report upon one or more systematized schemes of such improvement, involving all waterways heretofore examined, together with any natural or artificial channels essential for the utilization thereof, whether heretofore examined or not; also upon all projects heretofore adopted, the further improvement of which is not desirable or the expenditure upon which is out of proportion to the benefit derived therefrom. Such report may include other related information pertaining to the uses or control of the waters of the country, and the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for such examination and report.

The purpose of that amendment was to provide a systematic control of river and harbor improvements. That item went out in conference, and somebody somewhere in referring to section 2, the amendment inserted by the Senate and not put in the bill, assumed to make remarks something like this concerning the House:

So far as the House of Representatives is concerned, however, it remains still attached to the system of spoliation—the system of pothole appropriations, controlled by the Representatives of various districts, through which they secure nomination and office; a system which is cynically regardless of the ultimate purposes to be obtained, the development of a system of waterways fitted for transportation, and not a system of waterways designed to secure the expenditure of public moneys in the interest of men seeking office.

I do not say that fairly describes the attitude of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing to agree to this amendment, but I am informed that a certain distinguished Democrat made the statement. Mr. Speaker, there is another item to which I wish to refer. In various items which were inserted in the bill by the Senate the House conferees have insisted upon inserting these words, "which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work." The House conferees have insisted upon inserting those words in several amendments of the Senate, and those words——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to say those words first appeared when the Senate amendment made provision for the improvement of the lower Mississippi River. They were afterwards inserted in the three provisions—one for Mound City, another for Cairo, and another for the Arkansas River. Those insertions were made in conference.

Mr. MANN. They must have been made by the House conferees, the Senate conferees could not amend their own amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I say they first appeared in the provision for the improvement of the Mississippi River, and were inserted by the Senate and not by the House. Afterwards the same provision was made in the provision for Mound City and Cairo and the Arkansas. Those were made in conference.

Mr. MANN. I am aware of that. I am glad the gentleman calls it to the attention of the House. I am just going to call attention to one particular item with that statement.

The item in reference to Cairo is $250,000. That was a Senate amendment, and in conference the House conferees insisted upon amending that Senate amendment by inserting in it:

Which shall be considered extraordinary emergency work.

I suppose that language might be read to 90,000,000 of the American people and there would not be 20 of them who would know what it was put there for unless they were informed specifically.

The eight-hour law passed in 1892 says:

The provision that the service and employment of all laborers or mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

Now, the little work that was done at Cairo under the special appropriation we made, with the river rising and threatening to sweep away the levee, was a case of extraordinary emergency, and the extraordinary emergency has passed by and no longer exists. In the eight-hour bill which was passed the other day, and which has become a law, but which only applies to contractors, we put a provision exempting levee construction from operation of that law. But the law now applies to the work on the levee. Most of it in the first place is done directly by the Government, or much of it, and this provision of the law applies, and it has been held that the work on the Mississippi River and the other rivers now being carried on is not a work of extraordinary emergency. And the purpose of inserting that provision in these items was to escape the eight-hour law. We have here a Democratic House one day passing an eight-hour law and the next day passing a law to exempt the appropriation made from the operation of the eight-hour law.

Next Wednesday we will have before this House a bill reported into the House by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] which proposes to amend the eight-hour law of 1892 by making it apply to all laborers and to all persons, whether they be laborers, mechanics, Army officers, Mississippi River Commission members, or what not, engaged in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, and we will be treated to the rare anomaly of this House on next Wednesday passing a law providing that all labor of all kinds upon rivers and harbors shall come under the eight-hour law, when on the Friday preceding they make an appropriation and provide that it shall not be controlled by the eight-hour law, because all of these laws must necessarily provide an exception in case of extraordinary emergency.

Does the Democratic side of the House, which proposes to pass the new bill next Wednesday, believe in it? If so, why do you to-day provide that it shall not operate? The time to do a thing is when you have a chance. This House can now withdraw its insistence upon inserting in these Senate amendments this provision that takes this appropriation out from under the eight-hour law, and that will be effective. Next Wednesday it can pass a bill in the hope that in the course of much business in the Senate between now and March 4 next it will not have a chance to get through the Senate. I shall watch with interest on Wednesday to see whether the distinguished gentlemen on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who insist that the eight-hour law shall not apply to the appropriations they are now making, will vote or offer to amend the bill next Wednesday which says that it shall apply. There is no extraordinary emergency now in reference to improving the levees on the Mississippi River.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to what has been said about the improvement of the Mississippi River. I can remember the time, and I am still a very young man, when I could take a little raft and float over all of the area within the site of my father's house on the prairie in Iroquois County, Ill., with the exception of a few little raises of the ground where houses were built. The rest was all under water. That land is all now drained through drainage districts, and tile-drained besides. The water then stood on the ground in little sloughs and swamps every spring until fall in many places. There were many places from which the water never disappeared. Now that water hastens to its great outlet, and the same is true over the mighty expanse of territory drained by the Mississippi River. All of the time we are adding to the land that is drained. Here and there we are cutting off a swamp which has acted as a reservoir for water, until in the course of a few years we probably will have drained all of the natural reservoirs, shallow in depth, which now hold back the water from running quickly to the river. And it is quite true that through these means of drainage we have added a burden to the lower Mississippi River which it is possibly proper and fair that we should at least in part attempt to correct.

Personally, however, I do not believe that under any of the plans which have yet been made it will be practicable to control the Mississippi River. With the enormous amount of water which will be thrown into that river in times of high flood in the future I do not believe it will be possible for the water to reach the Gulf of Mexico between the banks now established or through the channel now laid out and used. That is one of the things we may learn about in the future. Meanwhile, doing the best we can, we will continue to drop a flood of money to prevent the flood of water.

I yield to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WATKINS). For how long?

Mr. MANN. I do not know how long the gentleman wants to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the right to speak in his own time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to know about that.

Mr. MANN. How much does the gentleman desire?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman such time as he may want.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is 20 minutes——

Mr. MANN. If he uses it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this subject to-day until after the discussion had proceeded at some length. Having lived on the Ohio River for most of my life, I have become interested by force of habit in the commerce of the district lying on the great thoroughfare which forms a part of the Mississippi Valley.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that the Mississippi Valley comprises the greatest productive section of any country in the world, larger in area and more fertile than can be found elsewhere. While I have not at hand the data comparing the products of the Mississippi Valley with those of the other portions of the United States, yet it is by far larger than all other parts in the production of agricultural products, taking in the cereals and the animals which are used for burden and for food.

Having associated myself with all of these inspiring elements that exist along one of the greatest rivers of the world, and having my home fixed upon the banks of that splendid river, upon a promontory which gives a beautiful view for miles below and for miles above [applause], and having spread in front of my home in the midst of the river a beautiful island of more than 1,000 acres, fringed with willows and green with rustling corn—Hurricane Island by name, and more fertile than the valley of the Nile—further on across the Ohio, into the misty distance in Kentucky, rising above the horizon, with their lofty peaks kissing the clouds, lies the broken yet picturesque range of the superb Ozark Mountains. Thus surrounded, I naturally take a deep interest in all legislation which has for its object the improvement of these great thoroughfares. [Applause.]

A vast stretch of territory lies on the Kentucky side, starting in just below Caseyville, where the shallows lie, and where

Congress, in its wisdom, has determined to construct a dam and lock system. I have viewed that territory with great alarm, as to what would be its future, because of the ravages of the mighty floods which annually sweep down on that side of the river. A large area of fertile territory there, more than 50 miles long and averaging from 1 to 10 miles wide, is to-day threatened with ruin by overflows of the Ohio River, and is likely to be swept away or cut up by various lagoons worse than it was before it was cleared and converted into fertile farms.

The eloquent speech of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] on the necessity of constructing levees on the Mississippi at the expense of the United States has led me to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is as great a necessity for constructing a system of levees on the Ohio River from Evansville to the mouth of the Ohio. A few years ago the district of which I have been speaking was as free from danger, apparently, as the Rocky Mountain system from the overflows of the Ohio River. But to-day there are great and vast holes dug out here and there by these overflows, which are perhaps 100 yards in diameter and from 50 to 75 feet deep. It shows what a wonderful effect the overflows have on the surface of a territory overflowed.

On the Illinois side of the Ohio we have a city with a great wall surrounding it, like one of the walled cities of old, made necessary because of the destructive floods. A few years ago this wall gave way during one of the dreadful overflows, and the mad waters plowed a mighty gap through the city and carried away every house in its wake. It was a most trying moment with the inhabitants, many of whom saved their lives by climbing to the top of this wall and waiting for boats of rescue, while others less fortunate found watery graves. This city, Shawneetown, is now the oldest city in Illinois. Kaskaskia, once the oldest, has long since been destroyed by the overflows of the Mississippi River. Not a vestige of the site of that city remains to-day. Where it once stood lies now far out in the Mississippi River. It is not only our duty to preserve Shawneetown, because it is the oldest town now in Illinois, but it is our duty to protect it because of the necessity of a levee to protect the people and their property from destructive overflows.

Maunie, on the Wabash, is now threatened with destruction because of destructive overflows on that river. I am informed that the force of the water has been so great of late years that the surface of that portion of the town lying near the river has been cut away so that several of the houses have been destroyed and many more are threatened. I am much gratified to know that Congress generously gave the people of that thriving town a survey of the Wabash River at that point, and I feel confident that at the next session of Congress you will make the required and necessary appropriations to repair the damage and prevent the threatened destruction of the town.

Congress has also generously given a survey of the Little Wabash and the Saline Rivers with a view of making the necessary appropriations to dredge, deepen, and straighten the channels of these rivers in order that they may be made more serviceable to the farmers who annually raise wonderful crops in the valleys of these rivers to be transported to the markets. This will help to save the crops from destruction by overflow. Let us do our duty to the farmers.

Mr. Speaker, the continuous drainage of the land once covered with a forest and patched with leaves sufficient to hold in check all waters the year round, and holding fast vast bodies of water in lagoons and lakes, has continued to such an extent that to-day in the Ohio Valley you can scarcely find a piece of territory which has not been converted into fertile fields for farming purposes, with no standing waters, no forests to check their flow; but a free sweep, aided by a fine system of drainage by tiling, now carries that water into the Ohio River, whereby it is conducted into the Mississippi River, down to its destiny, the Gulf. What was a security in the past from these overflows has been converted into a danger to-day, and what was thought to be useless in the expenditure of money for the protection of the farmer in these valleys has been converted into a dire necessity. Mr. Speaker, as the conditions change, the necessity for the appropriation of money to care for these fertile lands becomes greater and grows as time passes.

I was interested in the discussion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when he compared the appropriations which were made by the House for improving the rivers and harbors with that which came back from the Senate. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate had made an additional appropriation, and, to speak frankly as a new Member of this House, I believe that much of the increased appropriation was well advised, and for my part I have no objection to it and will vote freely for it. [Applause.]

The cheapest transportation that there is in this country is on the great rivers and lakes. You do away with them and let them fill up and stop the channels of commerce on these great thoroughfares, and then we will have nothing except the railroads, and our experience with railroads is that wherever they do not have competition their rates by some means gradually rise so high that we have to get up on a stool, like a baby at the table, in order to see the top of them. [Laughter and applause.]

If we want to be secure in the rates of transportation, we ought to keep up the rivers and the lakes of this country, so that there will not be a monopoly by one system of transportation. And the way to do that is to adopt a system of dredging our navigable rivers and deepen and widen their channels so that they may be free for all the people, in order that the farmer may have cheap transportation for his products. [Applause.]

In my own district there are a number of such rivers. The Wabash and the Little Wabash are navigable streams, and all that is necessary in order to make them more so, so that they can carry all the wheat and corn that is raised in those fertile valleys, is the appropriation of enough money to dredge them and straighten the channels and widen them so as to give free transportation the year round to boats that ply up and down these streams. The Saline River and a number of smaller rivers are of such a nature that they can be made to carry enough water to give transportation all the year round, and all that is necessary to be done to them is to get active and busy and take care of what God has so graciously given us. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] desire to use his time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

VIRGIL GUNNELLS—LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. HULL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Virgil Gunnells, Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

H. J. Res. 220. Joint resolution to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

COST OF OCCUPATION OF PHILIPPINES (H. DOC. NO. 875).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

The following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives January 25, 1912:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to submit a statement to the House showing the cost which has accrued to the Government of the United States from the beginning of and as the result of the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States.

The cost to the Government of the United States resulting from the occupation of the Philippine Islands, through direct appropriations by Congress, is as follows:

(a) By the act of March 3, 1901, to carry out the obligations of the treaty of November 7, 1900, covering the cession by Spain to the United States of certain small islands belonging to the Philippine Archipelago lying outside the lines described in the treaty of Paris, $100,000.

(b) By the act of March 3, 1903, for the relief of distress in the Philippine Islands, $3,000,000.

(c) By the act of March 3, 1903, for completing the census of the Philippine Islands, $351,925.50.

The total cost accruing to the Government of the United States for the purposes defined by the three acts cited was therefore $3,451,925.50. There has been no other direct exenditure from public funds of the United States solely for and on account of the Philippine Islands not subsequently repaid from Philippine revenues. On the other hand, there was expended from the revenues of the Philippine Islands from 1898 to 1900, in the execution of the direct military purposes of the United States, a total of $4,975,747.52, for which no reimbursement to the Philippines has been made. There is consequently a difference in direct expenditures in favor of the Philippine Islands of $1,523,822.02. Whatever cost has accrued to the United States, in addition to the direct expenditures above cited as a result of the occupation of the Philippine Islands, has resulted from the military and naval operations in and about the archipelago and from the construction of fortifications and naval stations therein. The total amount thus expended can not be determined with any degree of accuracy. In this connection your attention is invited to Senate Documents No. 339 and No. 416, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, wherein are printed the reports of the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of the Senate of April 17, 1902, which resolution sought to obtain information regarding expenditures on account of the Philippine Islands of the same nature as desired by your resolution of January 25, 1912. These reports of the Secretary of War set forth the data desired for the periods indicated as accurately as was then possible and show the difficulties attending compilation of data of the kind desired and the impossibility of securing accurate results.

The same difficulties, intensified by the changing conditions during the period that has since elapsed, exist to-day and render the problem presented by your resolution practically insoluble.

The cost of the military and naval operations in the Philippines resulting from the occupation of those islands is and must always remain a matter of argument. These operations resulted in part from the War with Spain and in part from the insurrection in the Philippines incident thereto; but the Philippines were not a cause of the War with Spain, nor is it possible to separate the cost of the war in the Philippines from the cost of the war elsewhere, nor the cost of the War with Spain from the cost of the Philippine insurrection. Again, it is impossible to state what part of the cost of the support of the Army and Navy since the conclusion of the Philippine insurrection can be regarded as resulting from the occupation of the archipelago. We maintained a fleet in the Orient for many years. It can not be said definitely that our occupation of the Philippine Islands increased this fleet. The military forces now in the islands would have to be supported at home were they not in the Philippines. On at least two occasions their presence there has resulted in saving to the United States in the cost of sending troops to China for the protection of American interests. It is impossible, in other words, to determine clearly what part of the naval and military expenditures in the Philippines is chargeable to the cost of the islands and what part to the cost of national defense. The cost of fortifications in the Philippines can be more readily computed, but this is an item chargeable clearly to national defense rather than to the occupation of the Philippine Islands. If we had a naval station in those islands, as all persons of whatever view propose, such fortifications are necessary.

Aside from the direct appropriations of Congress cited above, the expenditures incident to military and naval operations, and the support of the United States forces in the archipelago, the Philippine Islands have been in no way a charge against the Treasury of the United States. In other words, with the exceptions named, the Philippine Government has been entirely self-supporting. Moreover, it has been throughout self-supporting in a larger sense than any other territorial possession of the United States. All expenses attached to the collection of revenues, to the administration of the Post Office Department and of the courts, to the survey of the islands, to the conservation of their resources, and to the improvement of their rivers and harbors, and to all similar public works, which elsewhere, as in Porto Rico, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands, are a charge against the National Treasury, are and have been paid from the revenues of the Philippine Islands.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 19, 1912.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asked permission to print certain statements in the RECORD. I entered an objection to the request, which I had plainly a right to do under the rules of this House. In the noise and confusion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] made a statement in reference to myself which I did not hear, and that is my reason for calling attention to it to-day. Had I heard his statement, I would have answered it very promptly. I think I owe it to myself and to the constituency that I represent to answer his statement at the earliest possible moment, for fear that my silence might possibly be misconstrued.

Had his statement reached only the ears of the Members of this House I would not trespass upon the valuable time of this House for a personal explanation or a denial. On page 9249 of the RECORD of July 18 the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], after my objection, made this statement:

> I have no objection to the objection of a man who is in favor of the Water Power Trust.

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that I might serve in Congress without incurring the displeasure or ill will of any man on the floor of the House. I have endeavored to be kind and manly and considerate and courteous to all of my colleagues. I confess that I cherished the hope that I could count every Member of the House my personal friend and that when I served my last term here I could go home feeling that I had the good will and friendship of every Member I had ever served with.

My offending on yesterday consisted in objecting. I think I ought to state why I objected, even though the rules do not require me to make an explanation, and neither is there anything in the rules that would justify any Member of this House in denouncing, or charging wrongdoing, or criticizing any colleague for exercising his rights to object under the rule to a request for unanimous consent. But this trouble began last Monday, on unanimous-consent day. I had on the Unanimous Consent Calendar a local bill (H. R. 24028) in which my constituents were vitally interested. If I were to serve in this House the balance of my life, I can not conceive of any bill or measure fraught with more good or of more importance to the people I represent than the local bill on the calendar of which I have made mention. That bill came here with a unanimous report of a committee composed of 21 members, 14 of whom represent the majority of this Chamber. I believe that every member of that committee is an upright, honorable man and a faithful and efficient Representative. This bill meant the devolopment of an important river—Clinch River—in the district I represent which with that development would carry cheaper transportation for steam and domestic coal to practically every community in the district and to towns and cities far down the Tennessee and the Mississippi Rivers.

It also meant the development of the iron, marble, zinc, and other mineral resources of three or four of the important counties in the district. It carried an expenditure in the end of many million dollars, and the practical improvement of that river by slack-water navigation for more than 100 miles and reaching the important coal fields of eastern Tennessee.

A private company offered to perfect this improvement at its own expense if granted the use of the water power for electric development. Congress had authorized the survey of this river and one of its ablest engineers—Col. Kingman—had made a favorable report for a lock and dam system to cost $1,400,000, with a series of crib dams and navigation for 75 miles. That report was submitted to Congress 12 years ago. Since that time the cost of material and labor has greatly advanced. Here was a private company which proposed to construct these dams of concrete, costing not $1,400,000 but more than $3,000,000, and operate at their expense every lock on that river. It was to save the National Government the cost of the improvement of the river and the perpetual maintenance of the locks and dams.

The men interested in this corporation, a majority of them Tennessee men and my constituents, furnished me with petitions from the people living along the river, asking that favorable action be taken on this bill. When the bill was reached on the calendar the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] objected. I asked him to withhold his objection, to give me three minutes in which to explain the merits of the proposition, with a view of having him withdraw his objection. That courtesy to me on a local bill was denied.

I believe it is the first time that I have seen that thing happen since I have been a Member of this House, where one colleague declines to withhold an objection to give the Member of Congress—the author of the bill—an opportunity to present a statement in favor of a purely local bill. The gentleman not only denied me that courtesy, but, representing a district eight hundred or a thousand miles away, clothed his objection to a unanimous report on a local bill with a veiled intimation that his opposition was on account of a water-power trust.

Mr. Speaker, if I am here as a Representative favoring a water-power trust which is seeking to take an unfair advantage of the American people, I have violated my oath of office. Not only that, but I have disgraced myself and am no longer worthy to be a Member of the House of Representatives. If I am guilty of this charge, and the gentleman from Illinois will produce his proof, I will tender my resignation as a Member of this House, for I will be no longer worthy of companionship or association with the honorable membership of this body. Neither would I be the kind or character of man who would be a fit Representative of the splendid people who sent me to Congress. If the gentleman has not the proof, then I say he owes it to himself, he owes it to me, he owes it to this House, to do what every honorable, fair man would do under those circumstances, namely, make a retraction.

A brave, honest, and manly man, one worthy of a place in this House, one entitled to the respect and confidence of his congressional associates, will not misrepresent or slander a fellow Member. This is no place for a corrupt or an unfaithful Representative; nor is this a suitable place for a man who is the author of a slander or a falsehood against one of his colleagues.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the debate on the conference report on the river and harbor appropriation bill, which has just ended, discloses the fact that the National Government is about to enter upon a new field of river improvement, the building of levees along rivers, or rather, national aid for levees along rivers other than the lower Mississippi River. If the National Government undertakes to protect against floods lands along the lower Mississippi River, there is no reason why the National Government should not also undertake to protect against overflow lands along all of its navigable rivers. We have just passed a river and harbor appropriation bill carrying with it $35,000,000, in round numbers. The demand for river improvement is increasing, and as the demand for river improvement increases the demands of these water-power companies upon the Government to give away in its navigable rivers to them the power that can be developed therein is increasing also. I do not know how much power can be developed in the navigable river in which the gentleman is interested.

Mr. AUSTIN. What does the gentleman mean by saying that I am interested?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman said that I was interested. I am not interested in any of these propositions except as a Representative.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman need not be so nervous about it. The gentleman "doth protest too much."

Mr. AUSTIN. I resent that insinuation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois without the consent of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not say and I did not mean that the gentleman was personally interested in this enterprise. I do not know that he is and I did not so state, but he has taken a violent interest in this enterprise. I do not know how much power can be developed there, and nobody seems to know. The Government engineers have never reported upon that fact. The report filed here by the committee with the bill does not disclose any facts of that kind, but the statement he has just made—and he complains that I did not permit him to make it before and occupy three minutes in making it—shows that his company——

Mr. AUSTIN. It is not my company.

Mr. RAINEY. Again the gentleman "doth protest too much."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order. He must not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois without the gentleman's consent.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want the gentleman to stick to the truth.

Mr. RAINEY. His statement shows that this company, mentioned in the bill, in which the gentleman is interested—is the gentleman satisfied with that?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not interested in the company.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not say the gentleman was.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then stick to the truth.

Mr. RAINEY. The statement made by the gentleman about this company in which his friends are so much interested, and his constituents are so much interested, that he thinks his place in this House is in danger if he does not get it through, discloses the fact that this company down there in his district and in his State is willing to expend the enormous sum of $3,000,000 for the purpose of building a dam there, if the company is given the water power that can be developed thereby.

In addition to that, they are willing to maintain and operate locks along the river and lights and things like that. Now, if that is true, then he has been asking us here to give away to his friends down there in his State and in his district no man knows how many millions of dollars. Now, the cities of this country own nothing valuable except the right to use their streets, and they have been engaged for 50 years in the business of giving away to private companies the right to use their streets. The cities are expected to maintain their streets. The National Government has no valuable right in these navigable rivers except the right to develop the water power therein, and the Government is being asked to give this away and at the same time to expend money in maintaining river channels and banks.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes additional.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be granted and that the gentleman will give me proof of his charge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. The other day there were six of these bills on the calendar. I had no personal feeling against the gentleman and have none now, nor have I against his bills nor against any gentleman who presented any of those bills and who appeared here as the proponent of any of them, but I blocked every one of them and in blocking them on that day I saved the Government at least $25,000,000. And I want to serve notice upon the gentleman from Tennessee and upon everybody else who is interested in these private power bills, or rather whose friends are interested in them, that I propose to block on this floor every one of them as fast as they come up and to fight every one of them until some policy is adopted by this Government whereby a portion of these revenues can be saved for the Government and used for the purpose of developing these rivers and protecting the adjacent land from overflow. Why, it is possible within the next 25 years——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. It is possible to develop in these United States within the next quarter of a century $600,000,000 worth of water power every year. Is it too much to contend that one-sixth of it, $100,000,000, every year ought to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to be used in developing these rivers, protecting their channels, and incidentally protecting the land on either side of their channels? Is that unreasonable? We devote all the money we derive from the public domain from leases on timber lands and sales of timber land and all public lands to the creation of one great fund for the purpose of reclaiming the arid lands in the West. Is it any stretch of the constitutional powers of this Government to extend that same principle of conservation to our rivers and to stop this practice of giving them away?

Now, I have no personal feeling against the gentleman from Tennessee, but the other day when I blocked the bills of his friends upon this floor he got up in his place and defiantly said:

> The gentleman from Illinois will never as long as he remains in this Congress get another bill through of this character.

Now, I did not know what to do about it, whether I ought to resign and go back home or stay here and try to discharge my duty as a Member of this House. I finally concluded to stay and to try to discharge my duties as a Member of this body. But the gentleman went further than that——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. The gentleman went further in his threats; and the next time I appeared upon the floor I presented to the House, after the speech of the Socialistic Member [Mr. BERGER] some articles on socialism. I presented the other side of the question as printed in the American Anti-Socialist. I also presented a list of books upon socialism upon the other side of the question and simply asked permission for the enlightenment of the public, and a very considerable number of people are not yet in favor of socialism, to print these extracts in the RECORD, and the gentleman carrying out his threat to make my service in this House useless as much as he could, and extending his sphere of operations beyond what he proposed to do, arose in his place and objected to that.

Now, the Socialists of this country are in favor of consolidating everything, the railroads, water power—everything—into a few hands, believing that then they will be able to take it over easier than otherwise, and you can expect a man who speaks for a water-power trust to be in perfect harmony with the position——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAINEY. And so he objected to placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD something which criticized the policy of socialism. Now I do not want to do the gentleman an injustice. I want to say, however, that if I have succeeded in making it odious upon this floor for any man to represent any of these water-power steals in their operations against this Government, if I have succeeded in making that odious, and in making it necessary for gentlemen to get up here and say, I do not belong to—I do not represent—any water-power trust, great or small, then I feel that I have already accomplished much.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman expired.

Mr. RAINEY. And in answer to the gentleman I want to say that I am glad to hear him say he does not represent this water-power trust.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to credit in the accounts of Morton E. Crane, secretary and disbursing officer of the Immigration Commission, the sum of $654.29, being the amount disallowed from his accounts by the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment relative to the advancement to higher grades of every permanent officer of the consolidated corps on the active list and below the grade of colonel who has lost in relative rank through the inequalities of promotion and the operation of separate promotion within the three departments, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 25531), which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

NELLIE ORTON NICHOLS.

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 363), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Nellie Orton Nichols, widow of David Robinson Nichols, late a private in the Capitol police, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that an article by Mr. Winthrop L. Marvin, who is a well-known historian of the American merchant marine, in regard to vessels in the Panama Canal, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Herald, Friday, July 19, 1912.]

THE AMERICAN FLAG IN THE PANAMA.

(By Winthrop L. Marvin.)

Whether President Taft and Senator LODGE on the one hand or Great Britain and Senator ROOT on the other are right as to American control of the Panama Canal may be a moot question. But there can be no possible dispute as to the practical results of acceptance of the British contention on the maritime strength of the United States.

The consequences would be worse than a foreign war—not only deep but permanent. The British contention in brief is that we have no right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to protect or prefer American ships in the great waterway which American money and toil are constructing. That same contention under other treaties has been successfully enforced against American ships on the high seas for more than 60 years, with the result that Boston, for example, with 482,000 tons of shipping owned and registered in 1855, now has less than 30,000.

The laws of the United States protect a cotton mill or a woolen mill or a shoe shop or a foundry, but they do not protect an ocean ship. That is why the United States has thousands of factories but almost no shipping in ocean commerce. The whole problem of the American merchant marine is summed up in these few words. Under all other flags in a greater or less degree ocean shipping is a protected industry. In this country, the chief protectionist Nation in the world, it is unprotected—the only unprotected industry of all exposed to foreign competition.

Why it is unprotected is a long story going back into history, but a knowledge of this history is essential to an understanding of the real significance of the new and fierce British contention that we have no right to prefer our ships at Panama. Ocean shipping has not always been an unprotected and almost dead industry in this country. The very first real law of the fathers of the Republic under the new Federal Government—framed and passed under the eye of Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Madison on July 4, 1789—besides providing a tariff "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures," gave American shipping the advantage of a remission of 10 per cent of the customs duties and also preferential tonnage taxes on all foreign goods imported under the American flag.

At that time only 23 per cent of American exports and imports were being conveyed beneath the Stars and Stripes—all the rest under foreign colors, chiefly British, as now. The effect of that law was magical. American registered deep-sea shipping rose from 123,000 tons in 1789 to 667,000 in 1800, and the proportion of American commerce carried by our own sailors from 23 to 89 per cent. This splendid advance continued until the embargo and the approach of the War of 1812. As Mr. H. C. Adams says in Taxation in the United States: "The growth of American shipping from 1789 to 1807 is without parallel in the history of the commercial world."

This preferential policy of the fathers applied to American ocean trade in general, but to encourage long voyages to the East Indies a special and even more vigorous policy was enforced. Tea was then the chief commodity of oriental commerce. A high duty was levied on it if imported in foreign ships, but a low duty if brought direct in American ships by way of the Cape of Good Hope. On a cargo of 100,000 pounds of tea an American ship from China or India would pay about $10,000 in duties, but a foreign ship would pay $28,000. This was intended to be and was prohibitive. It made the China trade as completely our own as our coastwise commerce. The American Institute in 1828 reported that since the passage of that law "not a single pound of tea has been imported which has not been brought in an American bottom."

That was the law which created the merchant princes and the merchant fleets of Salem, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. A Federal statute lay at the foundation of those chapters of romance.

The new national policy was regarded as resentfully in Great Britain as the present proposal to remit the tolls to American ships at Panama. After the War of 1812, and practically as one of the conditions of peace, the preferential duties were withdrawn against British ships in the direct trade with the United Kingdom. The result was disastrous, or, as McMaster, the historian, says, "wholly favorable to England." But it was a part of a treaty—not the peace treaty, but a special convention—and the British Government held us to it just as it is now endeavoring with distinguished American help to hold us to the strict British interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote compact. American shipping fell from 800,000 tons in 1816 to 583,000 tons in 1820. Fortunately this ill-starred treaty did not cover all our commerce. American shipowners and sailors were still protected in other trades than the direct trade with Great Britain—and continued protected in part until 1849. By 1828 our registered fleet had again advanced to 757,000 tons, more than 200,000 tons below the fleet of 1810, but sufficient to convey 89 per cent of our foreign commerce.

In 1828 the nonmaritime States, over the protest of shipowners and merchants, foisted on the country a miscalled reciprocity act abolishing preferential duties in general against the ships of all nations that enforced none against our own. Gradually under this act commercial treaties have been made stripping our ocean ships of all preference and leaving this industry at the end unprotected against new forms of foreign aggression. This act of 1828, as Prof. J. R. Soley well says in "The Maritime Industries of America," "has done the United States, especially in South America, a great and lasting injury." "It caused at once an enormous reduction of our registered tonnage, while the proportion of our own carrying trade which we had then maintained for eight years—namely, 90 per cent—began almost immediately thereafter to fall, and it has been falling ever since until it has reached almost the point of extinction." In 1845 we were carrying 81 per cent of our commerce under our own flag; in 1860 only 66 per cent. By this time American ocean shipping had become wholly an unprotected industry.

The Irish famine and its demand for foodstuffs, the California gold discovery, and the Crimean War, between 1847 and 1855, gave a great temporary impetus to our registered tonnage, but the actual decline in our ocean shipping had begun several years before the Civil War. In 1855 no less than 583,000 tons of ships, including 381 square-rigged vessels, were built in the United States. By the year 1859 the output of our yards had fallen to 156,000 tons. The doom of the American merchant marine was written where everyone could read it, several years before the Alabamas and Floridas were launched and manned by eager British hands—several years before the first shot was fired at Sumter. The war did not destroy our ocean fleet. All the American tonnage burned or sunk by Anglo-Confederate cruisers between 1861 and 1865 exceeded little the loss of the one port of Boston in the years of peace from 1855 to 1861.

It was not war that worked the ruin of the American ocean fleet—it was the same economic policy which the British Government, aided by some American statesmen, now proposes to enforce at Panama. The American diplomatists who framed the fatal commercial treaties of 1828–1861 were honest and patriotic men, but they were fearfully mistaken. When they agreed that all preference should gradually be withdrawn from American ships, our wooden sail fleet was the second largest and incomparably the finest in the world. Those diplomatists and many of our lawmakers believed it to be invincible. But they did not look ahead and see the incoming of the steam engine and the iron hull—and, above all, of the British subsidy.

When the British diplomatists, shrewder and more experienced than our own, had securely tied us hand and foot in the treaty stipulations that we should not shield our ocean shipping by the wonderfully successful American method of preferential duties in any trade, steam navigation was in its infancy. The best experiments had been tried on this side of the Atlantic. Yankee mechanics were of the same blood as Yankee seamen. Left to individual initiative, Americans would unquestionably have triumphed in steam as they had in sail. But there was to be no fair and equal chance. The cards were stacked against us.

As far back as 1834 the British Government had begun the giving of subsidies to steamship lines. In 1840 the first British trans-Atlantic service was established—the Cunard Line, created outright by a grant of $425,000 from the British treasury. This was quickly followed by other subsidized lines to the West Indies, South America, and the Orient. British shipowners, with profits guaranteed, developed engine works and iron-ship yards that built not only mail liners but steam cargo "tramps"—so that the new and potent protection of subsidy, though applied nominally to national postal lines alone, really aided every branch of British shipping. This was the deliberate purpose, as the parliamentary committee on ocean mail contracts said in 1854, "To afford us rapid, frequent, and punctual communication with distant ports which feed the main arteries of British commerce, and with the most important of our foreign possessions, to foster maritime enterprise, and to encourage the production of a superior class of vessels which would promote the commerce and wealth of the nation in time of peace and assist in defending its shores against hostile aggression." In other words, the British subsidy policy on which at least $300,000,000 has been expended up to date was frankly and aggressively protective in its character.

With this formidable British weapon our unprotected ships in foreign commerce, whether of wood or iron, with sail or steam, could not compete. From 1847 to 1856 an effort was made to meet British subsidy by American subsidy on the north Atlantic. It was successful—our steam tonnage surpassed Britain's in growth, speed, and efficiency—until the American subsidy was suddenly canceled by the dominant South in the passionate quarrels that preceded the Civil War. From that time to this every effort to subsidize American ocean ships or prefer them in any way has been defeated by a combination of South and West in Congress. Now our American tonnage actually employed in real foreign commerce has sunk to about 500,000 tons, or less than one-half of the fleet of a century ago, conveying about 8 per cent of American commerce. The remaining 92 per cent is monopolized by the ships of foreign governments, our rivals in trade and possible enemies in war, to which we pay an annual tribute estimated at upward of $200,000,000.

This story of how we Americans have been first outwitted, then beaten, and now nearly destroyed on the ocean is worth telling as a certain forecast of what will happen in the Panama Canal if the British contention is sustained by American lawmakers. The British Government is perfectly well aware of the causes that have prevented and probably will continue to prevent subsidy legislation at Washington. No subject is more keenly followed by the diplomatic corps than this one. A Democratic House has just voted, by a decisive majority, to remit the Panama Canal tolls to American coastwise ships. But the whole world knows that this Democratic House, controlled by men from nonmaritime States, would never grant a dollar of compensatory subsidy to American shipping. If free or repaid tolls to American vessels can be forbidden by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the results will be (1) that every American ship engaged in foreign trade through the canal will be run off the route by subsidized foreign competitors, and then (2) that the domestic shipping now covered by the coastwise law will be so discouraged that it will prove inadequate to the trade, and an imperative demand will then arise that this coastwise traffic, too, be opened to foreign shipowners.

These results are as sure as the rising of the sun to-morrow if the British contention is successful at Panama. And every American citizen in public office or at an editor's desk who now echoes and approves the British demand is helping to pass a sentence of death on what is left of the American merchant marine. It is well that this should be understood in season.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask to have printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 881) an address by Mr. Samuel H. Barker, a distinguished citizen of Philadelphia, Pa., and financial editor of the North American, delivered before the American Supply and Machinery Manufacturers' Association at its annual meeting held in Norfolk, Va., May 14, 1912, on the Panama Canal and the restoration of the American merchant marine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana makes the point that there is no quorum present. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Reed
Bourne	Fall	Massey	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gardner	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	Heyburn	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Swanson
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Tillman
Clapp	Kenyon	Percy	Townsend
Crawford	Lodge	Perkins	Warren
Cullom	McCumber	Poindexter	Wetmore
Cummins	McLean	Pomerene	Works

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of sickness. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 105, commencing in line 7, which was amended, and the yeas and nays demanded.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senate to understand the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 105, after line 6, the committee proposes to insert:

Purchase of motor boat, Alaska: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to purchase a motor boat for use in the District of Alaska in the investigation of unlawful cutting of timber from the public lands, the inspection of timber cut under permit, and the examination of alleged illegal entries, $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us take the question by a division.

Mr. REED. If the matter can be passed over just by consent until there is a fuller attendance and then returned to, I will withdraw the demand.

Mr. WARREN. What is the request?

Mr. REED. I suggested that in view of the small attendance in the Senate this morning we do not have a roll call and that this matter be passed over temporarily.

Mr. WARREN. That will be agreeable.

Mr. REED. I withdraw the demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays, and, without objection, the amendment will be passed over for the present. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 11, after the words "forest-reserve purposes," to strike out the sum "$2,000" and insert "$26,000," so as to make the clause read:

Restoration of lands in forest reserves: To enable the Secretary of the Interior to meet the expenses of advertising the restoration to the public domain of lands in forest reserves, or of lands temporarily withdrawn for forest-reserve purposes, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 21, to insert:

Examination of California lieu selection, 1912 and 1913: To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to make field examinations of selected lieu lands in the State of California and to adjudicate the same in the General Land Office, $28,000: Provided, That agents or others employed or detailed under this appropriation shall be allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day each and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares.

The amendment was agreed to:

The next amendment was, on page 107, after line 7, to insert:

Protection of national monuments: For the preservation, development, administration, and protection of the national monuments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the salaries paid the custodians hereunder shall not exceed $900 each per annum, $5,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to know a little more about that amendment. Where are these men employed?

Mr. WARREN. There are something like 25 or 30 of them scattered in different parts of the country. Would the Senator like to know in what parts of the country they are employed?

Mr. REED. Well, in a general way.

Mr. WARREN. I have the list here of 28:

Alaska	1
Arizona	6
California	5
Colorado	2
Montana	2
New Mexico	4
Oregon	1
South Dakota	1
Utah	3
Washington	1
Wyoming	2
Total	28

Mr. REED. Is it the business of these men to look after and inspect these monuments, or what is it?

Mr. WARREN. It is to take care of, prevent spoliation, and keep in repair the monuments and whatever the Government may own in connection therewith.

Mr. OVERMAN. What national monuments are there in Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. One of them is a natural monument that rises some sixteen hundred and odd feet, almost perpendicularly, called the Devil's Tower. There is a space large enough on the top of it for a garden. It never had been scaled until a lady some years ago, on the 4th of July, having spent a month before in investigating, getting spikes, and so forth, finally scaled it. Then, surrounding it are other smaller monuments and matters of extreme interest. So, the United States reserves quite a tract of land. I think there is a building upon the tract. That is probably one of the two monuments situated in Wyoming. It is situated in the northeast corner of the State.

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire if the fact that this lady scaled the monument has made it necessary to engage in keeping a salaried man there?

Mr. WARREN. I did not happen to be one of the committee of entertainment, so I can give the Senator no further information on that point.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a minute?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. My impression is that the monuments referred to in these cases are monuments on which land surveys and boundary surveys rest. I think that is the case with the one in Alaska. It relates to the boundary survey there.

Mr. CULBERSON. If that be true, what is the meaning of the word "development"—to develop these monuments?

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that the Senator cut me off a little short. There is the petrified forest, which I presume everyone has heard of. There are natural curiosities at various points, and the country has demanded their protection. Congress, so far as it is concerned, has cooperated and the departments have cooperated. It is a small amount. It seems to me that we should do one of two things. We either ought to provide for them or we ought to turn them back into the public domain.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has this appropriation been estimated for?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that among these 28 national monuments are Montezuma Castle, Petrified Forest, Tumacacori, and Navajo in Arizona; Muir Woods in California; Colorado in Colorado; Lewis and Clark Cavern in Montana; El Morro and Chaco Canyon in New Mexico; total, 9. One of these is an ancient Spanish mission church and 4 are prehistoric ruins of cliff dwellers and other ancient peoples, or inscription rocks; 1 is the so-called petrified forest and 1 the grove of giant redwood trees near San Francisco, Cal. Then there are in Utah the natural bridges, the largest in all the world.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has this appropriation been carried heretofore?

Mr. SMOOT. It has always been carried and estimated for. In order to keep these monuments from desecration, there has always in the past been a keeper employed by the Government to protect them. There are the remains of the cliff dwellers in these national monuments. The appropriation is asked to preserve these great natural monuments and curiosities of the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, certainly this is a misnomer, to say the least. These are not monuments; they seem to be natural formations. If they need custodians—and there are 28 of them, hundreds of miles apart—I am unable to see how they can be guarded under this appropriation, because the salaries of the custodians or guards, or whatever they are, are $900 a year, and there are only $5,000 appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me there? The Senator was somewhat amused about the Wyoming Devils Tower. There is no one there to guard that monument, and many of these other monuments have no guard. It is only where the formation or property is such that it might be destroyed by vandals that a guard is considered necessary. The Senator will see at once that with 28 so-called monuments and an appropriation of only $5,000, if salaries of $900 a year were paid to the guards, but few men could be employed. So the guards are put only where the formation would be destroyed or the property of the Government dissipated. Many of them, such as the one I have mentioned, have no one to guard them.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the Casa Grande Monument, in Arizona, so called, is included within the limits of a national park; and in the case of certain other of these great curiosities and relics of extinct civilization the President has been authorized by law to provide for their withdrawal from the public lands and include them within national parks or "monuments."

With reference to the Casa Grande in Arizona, for instance, it is an object not only of curiosity but of very great interest. The cliff dwellers' national monument in New Mexico is being investigated by archæologists and those interested from all over the world. In the city of Santa Fe, in the old governor's palace, which has been erected for 300 years, or something like that, they have pictures which has been painted by artists, at great cost to the State of New Mexico, representing the restoration of the cliff dwellings and scenes at this national monument. I can assure the Senator that if he would go to the New Mexico national "monuments" he could spend one, two, or three months certainly with great interest to himself. These matters are interesting to people all over the world.

A similar provision of law has been made in Mexico, and the mounds there, together with other evidences of ancient civilization in Mexico, are protected by the Mexican Government. The same thing is true in Yucatan and Campeche and Chiapas and other districts and States in Central America and South America. It is also true in the case of the pyramids in Egypt. Every civilized country, I think, has its national monuments under one name or another. With us we have found that there was a civilization antedating anything, of course, of which we have any record, and the only evidences on our continent of that civilization are attempted now to be preserved under withdrawals made by the President from the public lands, such as the Casa Grande Monument and the cliff dwellers' monument in New Mexico.

Other natural curiosities are being protected in exactly the same way at a very small annual cost. It has been done for a great many years. For instance, in the matter of the cliff-dwellers' monument there are houses a thousand feet above the bottom of the canyon and seven or eight hundred feet below the top of the canyon, in the sides of the cliff—houses in a good state of preservation containing as many as 34 rooms. No one knows who built them, and no one knows who occupied them. Scattered all over that country for miles are evidences of a civilization of this kind. Prior to the national park being created there the sheep herders and cattle herders and goat herders took charge, in many instances, of these ruins, and turned their goats and their sheep into them, and vandals went in and took the pottery which could be found in these houses and in the mounds surrounding them and destroyed it and carried it out of the country.

Now, these places are being protected under Government supervision, and there are laws on our statute books providing not only for the withdrawal and care of these relics, but prohibiting under penalties any destruction of any of these national monuments.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is very entertaining, and I am obliged to the Senator; but I should like to know now how four men are going to guard all these priceless treasures scattered hundreds and even thousands of miles apart? Either the statements made argue too much, or they argue nothing at all. If we——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. If we have these wonderful natural deposits and these archeological remains and curiosities scattered over a territory embracing hundreds of miles and if they are of the great value indicated, then four men can not guard them.

Mr. WARREN. O Mr. President, the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. Under this provision the guards can not receive over $900 a year, but many of them receive only $300. Men are employed who are living near by, and oftentimes they are paid perhaps but twenty, twenty-five, thirty, or thirty-five dollars a month.

Mr. REED. Well, how many have we, as a matter of fact?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know. I know we have 28 of the so-called monuments; but some of them are without guards, and perhaps it is intended to put guards in charge of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there are nine of the natural monuments that have to have custodians, and I can name them if the Senator desires.

Mr. REED. I do not care for that.

Mr. SMOOT. Of those nine there are some that are not paid over $300 a year. Men living in the immediate vicinity guard and protect the monuments, so that $5,000 will pay the guards for all of the monuments that need such protection.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, some years ago it was my privilege to visit many of these so-called monuments and freaks of nature in the western portion of our country, and I was thoroughly and wonderfully impressed with the necessity and wisdom of supplying a sufficient patrol or a sufficient number of guards to keep them from spoliation at the hands of vandals. They are not only curiosities, but they are genuine objects of education. My own criticism of this provision is that it is not big enough or broad enough for the splendid results that should follow, and, with the breadth and liberality generally in the make-up of my friend, the Senator from Missouri, I trust he will withdraw his objection and let this item go through.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not made any objection. I asked for information. We have developed the fact, I think, that either this item ought not to be allowed at all, because it is utterly inefficient and insufficient, or it ought to be greatly enlarged or else the statements made here this morning are made under a mistake. I did not object. I asked for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Surveying the public lands," on page 107, line 17, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," to strike out the sum "$450,000" and insert "$700,000," so as to read:

For surveys and resurveys of public lands, under the supervision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $700,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact, with which, of course, he is entirely familiar, that the amount of $450,000 contained in the bill as it came from the other House is the amount of the appropriation for last year and is the exact amount asked by the department for this year. I do not myself see, speaking as a Senator and as a member of this committee, why there is any necessity to increase the appropriation by $250,000, when the department does not want it and does not recommend it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not state it quite correctly. I think he will recall—for I believe he was in the committee room when that matter was discussed—the fact that this amount is not the amount that they had last year nor the year before. It is less than the estimate of last year and the year before. The Senator is right that in the first official estimate sent from the department they asked for $450,000. The Senator is right that that was the amount last year for the lump sum, but last year there were appropriations of two hundred and odd thousand dollars in addition, naming special localities where the money was to be used, and the year before there was also an additional appropriation of $350,000, naming the points where the money was to be used.

I am inclined to think the Senator was not in the room at the time the matter was explained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that in submitting the estimate of $450,000 he knew that amendments had been offered for a similar line of special appropriations—that is to say, localizing the expenditure—and it did not occur to him that he should include the additional amount in the one estimate; but he said that they would be very badly cramped and that the amount carried by the House bill would not develop the surveys as they should be. Furthermore he laid particular emphasis upon the fact of new States having been admitted in which there are large grants—old Spanish grants—and reservations of the Government on which the work ought to be done very soon, and that there ought to be large amounts expended in those two States in order to enable them to select the grants conferred upon them by the General Government in the admission acts and to make the settlements to which they are entitled; so that this $450,000, without designating any local special amounts would be really much less rather than more than it should be, and therefore much less than the appropriations of past years.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I will say that the chairman of the committee has some amendments to offer to the language of the paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Before that is done I desire to be heard.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I regret that this appropriation is as small as it is. A condition has existed in the Territorial governments of New Mexico and Arizona that ought to be called to the attention of the Senate. We have something like fifty-odd million acres of unsurveyed lands there. We have suffered as to these surveys, having no representation on this floor. Some of the States which were fortunately situated not only in being represented on this floor, but in being represented with remarkable ability and with remarkable industry, have had nearly all their lands surveyed. We have, I repeat, fifty-odd million acres yet unsurveyed. I find it impossible to ascertain in the department exactly how much land has or has not been surveyed. The Statistical Abstract and the commissioner's report differ so widely that it seems to me that I can not ascertain from what data I can get within a million acres the amount of the surveys in my State. That may be my fault, and I am not complaining of the department or of whomsoever compiled the Statistical Abstract, but what I state is true. I therefore appeal to the Senate for relief, inasmuch as the grants of land that we have received as a new State are so largely unsurveyed, and inasmuch as 47 per cent of the great State of Arizona is now held in reservations, those reservations taking, in my judgment, 90 per cent of the available lands of that State, so that we are relegated to the desert. Nobody will settle on unsurveyed land to-day. They will go, as they are going, to Canada. They will go where there is less friction and more freedom. What is the result? No man will go on that unsurveyed 57,000,000 acres of land, if I mistake not the figures, and take the risk that the location may fall on some unsurveyed reserve or within one of the school sections. So the matter stands without a dollar of appropriation directly for it. In the case of Wyoming and Idaho they had special appropriations of $100,000 or some similar amount in addition to the general appropriation, which was very proper, but the same consideration ought to have been also extended to the other States. I appeal to the Senate not that this should stand at all, but I should like an amendment of at least $75,000 directly appropriated to Arizona, as was the case in reference to Wyoming and Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that the total amount two years ago was $800,000 altogether, and that was expended.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Eight hundred thousand dollars altogether. It ought certainly not to be decreased this year. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] knows very well the conditions that have existed in his State in reference to these surveys. My friend from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has given notice of and had printed an amendment to this bill to at least give us an equal chance with the other States. I think he and I are justified in asking an additional $200,000 to be applied to our States, for they are in such a condition that they can not move until they get it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. FALL. Merely for a suggestion.

Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Arizona has said, I want to suggest to him and to other Senators here that New Mexico and Arizona are unable to utilize the lands which are given to all States upon coming into the Union, and which have been given by the Congress of the United States to those new States as they came in, so that they might share equally in the land grants with the other States of the Union. It is impossible for New Mexico and Arizona to avail themselves, or for either of them to avail itself, of the national domain which has been granted in the enabling act passed by the Congress. We have lieu lands; we have lands in lieu of school sections 2, 32, 16, and 36, which are granted to us where those sections were projected in or existed in a forest reserve. We have 8,000,000 acres of land given for the benefit of our schools, the only donation that has ever been made by the United States for free schools in either of these States; but we can not utilize any of that land, any of this great donation. We can not lease the lands or sell them until the surveys are made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from New Mexico has exactly anticipated and made better than I could have done the argument which I was trying to make. He has suggested, with the proper appreciation of conditions surrounding these States, that Congress ought to double rather than decrease the appropriation for the survey of these lands if they would do justice to us. Before this clause is passed, or after the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico shall have been acted on, I shall offer an amendment increasing the appropriation and applying it to Arizona and also to New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I was simply making the suggestion, Mr. President, that not only was this amount insufficient, but that we were going to ask the Senate to give us at least $100,000 additional to the amount which has been inserted here by the committee for the purpose of enabling these two States to avail themselves of the land grants for public-school purposes. We can not lease nor can we sell those lands until the surveys are made. Out of the ordinary appropriations last year New Mexico's portion was only $30,000. It will require $27,000 to survey for New Mexico alone the lands which the Congress has given to New Mexico, approximately the same amount for Arizona, and with this appropriation as it stands now—the total appropriation last year was about $800,000—with this appropriation of $700,000 the proportionate part Arizona and New Mexico would receive would give them only about $20,000, and it would require their equal proportionment of that amount for three or four years before it would be possible to have the lands surveyed.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question. Do I understand that the Senator from New Mexico has offered an amendment?

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Arizona gave notice that he would offer an amendment to increase the appropriation to $800,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from New Mexico also has an amendment.

Mr. FALL. Yes. I have an amendment. I will state to the Senator from Idaho that in the House bill as it came here the Senator will notice, on page 107, line 24, I think it is, there is a provision that these moneys—the $700,000—shall first be used for certain purposes and secondly for other purposes, so that New Mexico and Arizona, if this is allowed to stand as it came from the House, would not get one dollar of this entire $700,000, because they would come in under the second head.

I have offered and had printed an amendment which the committee——

Mr. CULBERSON. What State would be the last referred to as enumerated in the acts?

Mr. FALL. They refer to North Dakota, South Dakota, Idaho, Montana. I have a memorandum of them, but I have forgotten the other States.

Mr. WARREN. They have from time to time referred to nearly all the new States.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. But as the Senator knows, and as we ought to confess with a little shame, the Territories until now have not had representatives at one end of the Capitol and have not had votes at the other end, and that may be the reason why they have not been better taken care of.

I agree perfectly with all that the representatives of the new States say, that they require and deserve more than the other States.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is his intention merely to insert in this bill a general amount equal to what was appropriated last year for specific States?

In the hearing before the House committee——

Mr. WARREN. The proposition is not to locate it, but to have all in one general fund. It does not follow, because a State has an extra one year, that is a reason why it should have one this year. It would be a reason why it should not have the same another year rather than that it should have.

Mr. CULBERSON. For instance, last year Alaska had $150,000 extra; Idaho, $150,000; Montana, $100,000; Utah, $155,000—during the four years—and Nebraska, for resurveys.

$50,000 last year. Of course, if it is merely the object of the committee—and I was not present when it was considered or at the hearing—to insert in the bill in the general sum an amount equal to what was used last year for specific States, I have no objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. The amount the Senator from Texas has named covers more than one year.

Mr. CULBERSON. I read it from the book. It covers four years. Nebraska alone had $50,000 last year.

Mr. WARREN. It is the purpose of the committee to appropriate a sum total and to provide in language so that it may apply, as it can apply, where the surveys are most needed. I have an amendment to the language, which I propose to offer.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Before the Senator offers his amendment——

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think there will not be any trouble in agreeing to that; but I wish to move now to strike out "$700,000" and insert "$900,000."

Mr. FALL. "Eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, I will take $850,000. We can not get along on less. I am informed by the department itself—I have been over to see about it—that in the wintertime they can put a great force in our country, if they have the money, and it is absolutely essential to us that we should have it. I hope the committee will not cut off any part of my proposed amendment. Make it $850,000.

Mr. WARREN. It is true that under the present system of surveys, instead of the system of contracts or salaries, the surveyors who are used in the northern climes in the summer can go to the southern climes in winter, so that a large force can be thrown in there.

These two new States, through their able Senators, are most welcome, not only to me but to the entire Congress, and I am not going to object to the amendment offered, but pending that, I should like to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Wyoming, as far as he can, accept the wording which I shall suggest to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amount be agreed upon first.

Mr. WARREN. I have pending an amendment to correct the language of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment to the text of the bill, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 107, line 24, after the word "ninety," strike out the semicolon and in lieu insert a comma; strike out the comma after the word "and," which follows; strike out the word "second" and the comma which follow the word "and"; strike out the words "except railroad land grants," on the next page, line 1, and insert the same words after the word "of," in line 5.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask that the amendment as proposed to be amended be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as proposed to be amended will be read.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended it will read:

And the acts approved July 3 and July 10, 1890, and to surveying under such other acts as provide for land grants to the several States and Territories, and such indemnity lands as the several States and Territories may be entitled to in lieu of lands granted them for educational and other purposes, which may have been sold or included in some reservation or otherwise disposed of, except railroad land grants.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That makes it all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming as to the purpose of changing the location of the phrase "except railroad land grants." Does that leave any provision for surveying lands within railroad grants?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes. It simply does not put it in the preferential place, where it was before; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the purpose of changing its location?

Mr. WARREN. That is the purpose, to have it follow rather than to lead the others.

Mr. HEYBURN. Which would, of course——

Mr. WARREN. Change the order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Change the substance.

It is desirable that provision be made for surveying railroad land grants, and I did not know just what purpose the Senator had in mind in that regard.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator will find, on reading this provision, that this money, $850,000, now to be appropriated, is to be applied first to those purposes specified and second to other purposes, including the survey of land grants. That is one of the second items.

Mr. HEYBURN. Having that in mind I submitted the inquiry to the chairman. So whatever surplus there may be may be devoted to the survey of railroad land grants. That is desirable. Of course the change of the location of the phrase would be effective in regard to the survey of railroad land grants, as to their preference or order of survey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move now to strike out "$700,000" and insert "$850,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement in connection with the action just taken, in order that the record may be clear.

It was my purpose, and I had given notice of my intention, to offer an amendment to this bill in regard to surveys in the State of Idaho in conformity with the provision contained in the last appropriation act. In the existing law, Public Law 525, there is this provision:

For continuing the survey of public lands in Idaho, including the cost of office work in the surveyor general's office, not to exceed $3,500, $50,000.

I offered on April 3, 1912, an amendment, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which reads as follows:

For continuing the survey of public lands in Idaho, including the cost of office work in the surveyor general's office, not to exceed $5,000, $80,000.

Now, the reason I have not urged the adoption of this amendment is because of the increased aggregate appropriation, and it is proper that the RECORD should show this in order that there may be no further necessity of explaining why the amendment was not pressed which gave Idaho the equivalent of the appropriation of the last fiscal year. I desired to state in connection with it that the aggregate appropriation having been increased $400,000, I think, or about that——

Mr. WARREN. Four hundred and fifty thousand to eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; $450,000 to $850,000 gives an additional $400,000 to be apportioned by the surveyor general or by the department under whose control he acts, so that it will be the equivalent of a special appropriation expressly in the interest of Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and right here I will say to the Senator there is an unexpended balance of the appropriation of last year and the year before which is now being worked out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a statement from the surveyor general of Idaho giving those facts in connection with the unexpended balance; and had it not been that the appropriation was increased so as to amply provide for these States in which the surveys have not been carried forward I would have asked permission to place in the RECORD the statement of our surveyor general.

Just a suggestion for the benefit of the Senator from Arizona. The Senator spoke of the surveys of Idaho as though they were far advanced. Idaho is one of the States in which the surveys are very meager indeed, only a comparatively small portion of the State having been surveyed. It is not to be classed with Colorado or Wyoming or any of those States in which the percentage of surveys is above 90. In Idaho it is below 40.

I wished to make that statement.

Mr. WARREN. I submit an amendment which involves merely a change of language.

The SECRETARY. On page 109, line 6, strike out the words "immediately available" and insert in lieu thereof "available until expended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, after line 12, to insert:

For the temporary employment of the following clerks, for the purpose of bringing up arrears of work upon the returns of service in the General Land Office: Four clerks, at $1,200 each; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two copyists, at $900 each; four copyists, at $720 each; in all, $12,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 110, after line 3, to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, at the earliest practicable date, to make a survey of the sewer system of the city of Hot Springs, abutting the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark., and to prepare plans and estimate of the cost of increasing the present storm-drainage system as well as the present sanitary-sewer system of the city of Hot Springs, the report of survey, including estimate of cost of the work, to be submitted to Congress as soon as practicable after the 1st day of December, 1912. The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to cover all expenses incident to the work herein authorized, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 111, line 17, after the words "United States," to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$375,000," so as to make the clause read:

For topographic surveys in various portions of the United States, $375,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 111, line 19, after the words "United States," to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$325,000," so as to make the clause read:

For geologic surveys in the various portions of the United States, $325,000.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am going to move to amend by substituting $450,000 for the $300,000 recommended by the House and $325,000 recommended by the committee. The department advise that they require more for this purpose. I know of my own knowledge that a great many applications are being held up because they have not the money to make the necessary investigations as to the mineral character of the land. It does seem to me, as to this system of holding up the settlement of the farther West, that while some of it may be necessary that portion of it which is due to the failure of Congress to appropriate the necessary funds is not necessary.

I hope the committee will accept the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to amend the committee amendment by striking out "$325,000" and inserting "$450,000."

Mr. CLAPP. I will make it $400,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is to insert $400,000.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose the Senator has satisfied himself that he is within the estimates of the department.

Mr. CLAPP. I am within what ought to have been estimated properly.

Mr. WARREN. I am informed that it is within the estimates.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I merely desire to call attention to the fact that last year we appropriated only $300,000 for this item. The House proposes to give the same appropriation, and the Senate committee increased it $25,000. Now it is proposed to increase the amount recommended by the committee to $400,000, which is $100,000 for this item alone more than was given last year.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true, but it is equally true that the department can not and ought not to act upon a large area of our public land until they know the mineral character of those lands, and if it requires more it seems to me that it is our duty to appropriate the money.

Mr. SMOOT. I also call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are patents held up for two or three years for examination as to the mineral character of lands, and they are away behind in their work. It is absolutely necessary to give the increased amount of money to even bring up the work that is in arrears.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator from Utah why, then, the committee did not make provision for $400,000?

Mr. SMOOT. At the time they thought that perhaps the department could get along with the increase of $25,000 recommended by the committee, and they also thought that perhaps if they increased the amount beyond that it would not be agreed to. But there were a number of the committee who felt that the full appropriation of $450,000 ought to be made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this is an appropfiation that ought not to be required, but unfortunately under the practice of the department it seems to be necessary to furnish money for them to demonstrate the inefficiency of their service; and it is in the interest of enabling them to demonstrate the fact that they ought not to exist that I would vote for the appropriation. It is an innocent-looking provision, it is less than two lines; but it is one of the most far-reaching and disastrous provisions written on the statute books.

The law says that the public lands of the United States containing valuable mineral deposits are open to exploration, location, and purchase by any person a citizen of the United States or who has declared his intention to become such. That is the mining law which has existed since 1866, and it has resulted in the development of all the mineral respurces of this country. But now, within the last three or four years, the practice of the department has been to require all locations to pass the inspection and approval of men called special agents, experts—men who assume or are assumed to have the knowledge and ability to distinguish mineral from nonmineral lands. A greater farce never existed in Government or governmental policy.

The mines of this country have been found where they were and not where they ought to be. No theory in regard to where mines should exist has ever been justified upon test. The Supreme Court of the United States, recognizing the well-established fact, held in Chambers against Harrington, reported in One hundred and fifteenth United States, that a miner or prospector might make a valid location upon that which in his judgment justified his exploration and location of it. The courts undertook to say that he might reasonably believe that the thing upon which he made his location was mineral or would lead to the finding of minerals.

The Supreme Court of the United States very promptly overruled that doctrine and held that no person was or might be under the law authorized to object to the exercise of the right to locate a mining claim upon the judgment of the party making the location. They held that no part of the Government might say that he was not justified in making a location or that it was not reasonable that he should make such a location.

These administrative branches of the Government have undertaken indirectly to overrule the Supreme Court of the United States. The language, as I remember it, in Chambers against Harrington, is that a location may be made whenever the locator has found such evidence of minerals as in his judgment justifies him in making the location. Now, under the provisions of law for which this appropriation is made, they undertake to say that his judgment shall be subjected to the test of the judgment of their special agents, and we are going to give them a large amount of money to continue this iniquity. Perhaps the more money they have the sooner they will run themselves to death. Perhaps the more money they have the sooner they will emphasize this iniquity to the extent that it will be again brought to the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States, and they will receive another admonition.

A miner or prospector—and I regret to say that they are fast passing away and there is no new race of them coming, because the inducements under which they existed are being frittered away—the experienced prospector goes into the mountains, often into regions that have been condemned by the Government as nonmineral, and because of a certain instinct that is embedded in a prospector and in no one else he finds evidence that in his mind justifies him in locating a mining claim. He does not ask anything of the Government in the way of subsistence or compensation for his work, but he backs that judgment by his personal labor. It may be weeks, it may be months, it may be years; he develops it. It may turn out to be of no value, and the only person who has lost anything is this poor prospector, who has expended his labor upon it. It may turn out to be valuable. Perhaps one out of a hundred turn out to be valuable. Then he is entitled to the benefit of his industry and his perseverance.

But I have in mind—and every Senator from the mineral-land States knows of similar conditions—a case where the parties have backed their own judgment to the extent of many thousands of dollars of their own money in addition to a vast amount of labor by their own hands, and along comes one of these men whom we are going to pay out of this large appropriation, and he says, "Your judgment is not good. It is true you have been mining and prospecting for years, but I am just out of a technical college in the East where they teach a man how to find a mine. This thing that you are spending your time and labor upon here has no value and will never develop into a mine. So get off here. You are on the public domain of the United States. You can not remain here to test your judgment." No one takes his place. The spot remains barren and undeveloped, and the prospectors grow discouraged and they go away.

A few days ago there was a very interesting article in one of the western papers on the question of the disappearance of prospectors, and its effect upon the future wealth of the country. I repeat these prospectors have been driven out of the field. They are men of independent character. They will not work under the supervision and control of some forestry officer or inspector or special agent, or whatever he may be termed. They will leave the field undeveloped.

Had the present system and the system proposed to be sustained by this appropriation been in vogue from 1860 up to this day there would have been no Comstock mines; there would have been no mines in Grass Valley and that rich section of California; there would have been no mines in Colorado, or in Idaho, or Montana, because in no instance did the mine crop up out of the ground so that you could commence taking out oré and hauling it to the market or mill. It required long and dreary years of personal toil and endeavor on the part of the prospector before he could determine whether or not that which he has selected upon which to expend his energies was a mine or would lead to a mine.

I feel impelled to speak these words this morning in connection with the consideration of this question. I have on several occasions in the past 10 years called attention to these facts, but as the generations of legislators come and go it is necessary that they be kept fresh before the minds of those who are to act upon it, and some day they will burst the pod and branch and grow and result in curing this evil. I have grown somewhat disheartened during these years, but still I have faith that the time will come when Senators will give some heed to it. Some perhaps think they need no lesson or admonition in regard to it; it is a familiar subject with them; but there are others to whom the subject is not so new and who must remain here and deal with these questions as they come with each recurring appropriation bill.

I had it in mind to offer an amendment cutting out this service. I had hoped that some of the Senators who have given enough attention to this question to deal with it intelligently would have contributed something toward the amendment of this law and the cure of this evil. But Senators do not give that attention to it to which it is entitled.

Mr. President, it is the attention of Senators who have not grown weary of considering the rights of those people on the frontier that I desire. I have labored long in the years gone by with some and they have probably grown weary of the subject; but, nevertheless, it is a duty to present it. You are making an appropriation of a very large sum of money for the purpose of driving out those of our citizens who find the mines that produce the wealth that supports the country. Without these mines we would be doing business on a credit basis, represented by the promissory notes of the people of this country, with nothing behind them except the hope that you may be able to exchange the promissory note you receive for another promissory note. That is the situation.

You have blessings heaped upon you and you never inquire from whence they come. I would not say that you do not care, I would not say that any Senator of the United States did not care from whence the stability of the money of the country comes, but there is one thing sure, it does not come through crops or industry or enterprise other than mining. When the gold product of this country begins to fall off, as it will if no new mines are discovered in the near future, then you will realize that the fowl which produced the golden egg no longer exists. You will have some eggs on hand but they will not hatch, they will not produce any accretions; there will always be the same number that you had.

We sent you out of the State of Idaho over $200,000,000 in gold. That, with the gold from other States and Territories, constitutes the basis of the money of the country. Take it out from behind the money of the country and where are you? Are you never going to waken up to the fact that the mining industry is the principal industry of this country; that the mines have furnished you with the money with which you buy crops; that they have relieved you against a system of exchanges of commodities and placed you upon a money basis? I have seen audiences sit and look, some as though they did not know, and others as though they did not care where the money came from, but it ought not to be a condition existing in the legislative body of the country.

I am only speaking this in order to catch the attention of somebody who may through the processes of thought and reason realize that the mines are the most important industry in the country, because without them you would have no basis for business transactions of any kind.

I, also, in connection with that want to call attention to the fact that this appropriation is being made for the purpose of destroying the mining industry of the United States, of discrediting the mining industry of the United States, the mines of gold and silver, taking it out of the hands of competent, capable American citizens to discover and develop mines and placing over them a lot of political vultures. That is what they are.

The man who sat upon the dump of a mine in the southwestern portion of the State in which I live and upon which a man had expended $30,000 or $40,000 of his own money, and told him that he was not entitled to any rights there because, in his judgment, the mine that he was seeking did not exist, was a human vulture preying upon the industry, and the rights of an American citizen. I have recalled the incident more than once in this Chamber of one of those mines in the State of Montana, where a number of these, not smart men, except in their own judgment, wanted to put a man in the asylum and take his property away from him because they said that he was expending his energy and wearing out his life in search of a ledge that did not exist, under the impression that he would find a mine, that was afterwards the largest mine in Montana and produced more gold than any other mine in that State. Yet they would have taken that man to the asylum who was driving a tunnel with his own hands. I wonder how many men know what it is to hammer upon a rock and beat your way through hundreds and thousands of feet of solid rock in the hope of finding a mine.

This money is intended to prevent men from doing that and to compel them to submit to the judgment of these political vultures.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday afternoon that I would submit some remarks on the Panama bill this morning, and if the Senator in charge of the pending appropriation bill will yield for that purpose, I should like to go on now.

Mr. WARREN. While, Mr. President, it is somewhat unusual to yield for a speech during the consideration of an appropriation bill, I realize that the Senator has been very gracious about the matter, and did not take the time last night, and I yield to the Senator for the purpose indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that action upon the pending amendment might well be concluded. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 111, line 19, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$325,000" and insert in lieu "$400,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that I expect to proceed with the appropriation bill immediately upon the conclusion of the address of the Senator from South Carolina.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in the early part of this session we had under discussion the proposed treaties of arbitration between Great Britain, France, and the United States. On account of certain amendments that the Senate insisted upon and certain modifications of those treaties they are still not ratified by the three high contracting parties. The clause in the treaties to which the Senate objected was the clause involving the very principle now at issue in the question of our charging tolls in the Panama Canal. The particular clause which was finally objected to and stricken from the treaty by the Senate was in these words:

> It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under article 1 of this treaty, that question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry, and if all or all but one of the members of the commission agree and report that such differences in the scope of article 1, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions in this treaty.

Senators of both political parties contended that with the adoption of this paragraph it would be giving into the hands of an alien, or foreign tribunal, the settlement of questions which of right belonged to the United States alone. The questions which were referred to as being possible of arbitration, under the adoption of this section, were such as affected the vital interests of America alone. Amongst those cited as being questions which might arise which we would be compelled, under the adoption of that paragraph, to refer to foreigners for adjudication were southern bonds, the right of expatriation, and those questions affecting the vital interests of either of the contracting parties, alone, and not mutually.

The debate on this particular clause is the key to the whole international relation as it now confronts us. The question at issue, reduced to its last analysis, was, Should any country have a right, under treaty or otherwise, to demand that any question purely domestic or which related entirely to the vital interests of one of the contracting parties alone, because a citizen or citizens of the other contracting parties might become financially or commercially interested in it, be submitted to arbitration?

The question of southern bonds and the question of expatriation affect America alone. I quote from the speech delivered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the 29th of February, 1912, on this point:

> We separate them and take them out from the ordinary class of pecuniary claims. Our reasons for doing so are well known to us and rest on the broad grounds of justice and right. But the world neither knows nor understands our reasons. Whatever the decision of the high commission might be on this question, I for one do not believe in ever permitting the question of these bonds to go before any outside tribunal. They are our own concern.

In the same connection in the same speech he said:

Are you ready to submit to arbitration the question of the right of expatriation which we have supported, insisted upon, and enforced for more than 50 years?

Continuing, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

Will you arbitrate with Russia the question of her right to discriminate against certain classes of American citizens on the ground of race and religion as we discriminate against certain immigrants on the ground of crime and disease? I am not willing to submit those questions to arbitration, and I will not promise to do so.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, because later he changed his position, and I should be glad if he sees fit to explain that change. I am quoting from the Senator's speech on the 29th of February, 1912, in which he said:

It is easy to show that there are other questions not properly arbitral which might be brought before this commission. The tolls to be charged by us in the Panama Canal, which we have built at our own expense, might be brought before a tribunal, in whole or in part composed of foreigners, to be fixed and determined by them.

Further, the Senator said in the same connection:

Our title to the canal or to our territory anywhere is not to be dragged before any arbitral tribunal for examination and determination, and nothing should be subscribed to by us which by any twisting could be construed into a promise that we would submit such a question to any judgment but our own.

The logical deduction from this line of reasoning by the Senator from Massachusetts is to the effect that our judgment, and ours alone, in reference to our title to our canal territory is to be interpreted by us alone. If we decide that our title to this property is such as to make it practically a Territory of the United States in so far as our relations with foreign countries are concerned, then it seems to follow that any law we may make in reference to our own citizens in the use of this property, where it applies strictly to our citizens alone, is not a matter for arbitration.

The only question for us to decide in the Senate in reference to our right to charge or remit tolls to the citizens of the United States is the question of our ownership of this zone. If we determine that the character of our title as a Government in dealing with the Republic of Panama is such that our sovereignty in so far as navigating the waters of the canal are concerned is practically the same as navigating American waters, then no foreign power has any right to demand that it should be submitted to arbitration.

In article 3 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama the following language is used:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the right, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement, and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2, which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BRADLEY. I simply want to make an inquiry. Will the Senator give me the date of the treaty from which he is reading?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was from the treaty with Panama in 1903. It was subsequent to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I will bring that point out.

As will be observed, the extract from the treaty with Panama which I have just read explicitly sets forth that within this ceded zone the United States was given and assumed the exact sovereignty that the original owner of this zone possessed in the full and complete exercise of its sovereignty.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I caught correctly the reading of the extract the Senator quoted from the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], when the Senate was considering the arbitration treaties, that Senator then declared—and I am asking if my impression is correct—that this Government would not be willing to submit to arbitration any question relating to the tolls to be charged through the canal. Of course, that treaty provided for a particular commission. The Senator from Massachusetts was addressing himself to the proposition as to whether questions of purely domestic concern should be submitted to that commission, and in discussing it, as I understand the reading, the learned Senator then took the ground that he would not be willing to submit the question of tolls in any form in which it might arise to that commission or to arbitration. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts, in his speech the other day on the Panama Canal bill, to hold that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and under our arbitration treaty with Great Britain we would be obliged to submit any question arising between Great Britain and this Government to The Hague Court, which, in fact, is but a court of arbitration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was for that reason that I called attention to the seeming contradiction in the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, as referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and the position taken in his speech from which I have quoted in the RECORD of July 17, where the Senator from Massachusetts is quoted as saying:

It is, of course, also true, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pointed out, that if we should undertake simply to make our ships free, we should raise a question which would then, under our treaties of arbitration, necessarily go to The Hague.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I made that statement because the question as to our right to exempt American vessels from tolls would be a question arising under the interpretation of a treaty. A question involving the interpretation of a treaty would undoubtedly go to arbitration under our general arbitration treaties now existing. I confess at that moment I thought only of that proposition. Since then the debate has developed a point which I had not thought of, speaking as I then did offhand—the question of the Canal Zone being domestic territory to all intents and purposes. I am not prepared to say now, without further consideration, that we should be bound to submit a purely domestic question of that kind. I have no question, as I argued the other day, that the repayment of tolls to reach the same result of exempting American vessels would not be arbitrable, because that is purely a domestic question. Whether our territorial jurisdiction in the Canal Zone would not bring it within the same class I am not at all sure. I am not prepared to say that it would not, and that the Senator is not correct in the view he is now taking.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. Of course the debates are not now a matter of record, but I find that the Senator from California and some other Senators who were present remember very well that the Senator from Minnesota and I both made that statement in explanation of our votes against what was called the Bard amendment. I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction; and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because in the nature of things we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Massachusetts has just expressed a reason for his vote against what was known as the Bard amendment. Can the Senator inform us as to whether that was the general sentiment prevailing at that time among the Senators?

Mr. LODGE. I can only say, Mr. President, that that was the view of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was my view; and, while I may be mistaken, I think on that vote the majority of the Senate followed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I understand, the vote was something like 27 to 43.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The question of the Bard amendment, to which the Senator refers, was brought up; and on account of its being in executive session, and the debates not being available, I was unable to find any record showing what was the sentiment in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. There is no record that will show that, of course; but I know that was my opinion and the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator from South Carolina be kind enough to let me ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to lay some stress upon the fact that this has grown to be or is now a domestic question. I will ask him, in view of the second article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, which I will read in a moment, if it was not contemplated by that treaty that it might become a domestic question; and yet section 1 of article 3 provides that the canal shall be free and open, and so forth. I will read article 2:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

My inquiry is, Does or does not this treaty in itself show that it was based in part upon the probability that this might be a domestic question, and that the ownership of the canal would be in fact in the United States, making it all the more necessary to rest the inquiry into and the determination of this question upon the true construction of the treaty itself, without reference to any arbitration treaty obligating us to enter into a contest at The Hague?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask the Senator from Texas a question just here? He read from article 2, I believe.

Mr. CULBERSON. I read from article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. To what language in it does the Senator ask attention? I ask because I should like to follow him.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Texas drew my attention, as I understand, to the right there given the United States to build the canal entirely itself.

Mr. CULBERSON. "Under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost"—which has transpired to be the case.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does not that treaty contemplate and fix terms in contemplation of the United States themselves becoming the owner of the canal?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it does. As I said, frankly, I had not thought of that side of the question—our taking over the Canal Zone and making it to all intents and purposes domestic territory. The titular sovereignty remains in Panama, but the actual sovereignty is in the United States. I think that opens a question of very grave doubt, which certainly I am not prepared to answer finally, so far as I am concerned, at this moment. I think it opens a question of very grave doubt as to whether that is not as much a matter that is wholly within our own jurisdiction as the tolls on a canal built in our territory, like the Sault Ste. Marie or any of those canals.

Mr. POMERENE. With the permission of the Senator from South Carolina, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts another question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just explained his reasons for voting against the Bard amendment, taking the position that without it we would have the right to regulate and manage the canal. The Bard amendment was a substitute for article 3 of the pending treaty. The treaty, as finally ratified, contained in paragraph 1 of article 3 this language:

The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

If, under the treaty, we had general authority to control it and regulate it, why were we so specific in stipulating that we should have the right to maintain the military police which might be necessary?

Mr. LODGE. Because at that time it was not known, of course, on what terms we should have the zone or have the canal. It might have been built through the territory of Panama by a private company to which we might advance our credit. We could not tell what the conditions would be there. It was necessary, therefore, to reserve that right.

That clause as it stood in the first treaty contained a prohibition against fortification; and we put in the treaty a Senate amendment giving us the right to defend the canal in any way we pleased. When the second treaty was made, that amendment of the Senate was left out as well as the fortification clause, so that no restriction at all in regard to fortification was placed upon the United States.

As the matter stands now the military police provision is perhaps needless. But as it stood then, when we did not know under what precise terms we should build the canal, it was necessary to put it in.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In reply to the question propounded to the Senator from Massachusetts by the Senator from Texas, I will state that article 1 says:

The Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money, may construct the canal.

There is a parallel, and perhaps a precedent that might have been governing those who were drafting this treaty, in the case of the Suez Canal. The English Government, while it did not build that canal at its own cost, it obtained control of the majority of the stock of the corporation that built it, and practically was in control as far as that ownership gave it the right of naming the tolls and managing the vessels that used the canal.

But it seems that the ratification of the United States-Panama convention, which was subsequent to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entirely changed the situation. No Senator here would contend that subsequent to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if we had engaged in a war with Colombia, and as a result of that war, by virtue of conquest, had had ceded to us the territory that we now possess, it would not have become as much a part of the United States as the Philippine Islands. Therefore the alternative of that is also true—that exercising our sovereign power, we had the right to purchase the zone from Colombia in return for a stipulated price. Having purchased it, and having the right of that purchase explicitly set forth in article 3 of that convention, in 1903, the zone that we are now occupying became in fact a part of the territory of the United States, as intimate in its relation so far as the zone is concerned as any part that we now own on the North American Continent, known as the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I am only endeavoring to get information upon which to predicate my vote in this matter.

In further suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina, I want to read an amendment which was proposed in the Senate on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was submitted in 1900:

But nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to prevent the United States from acquiring at any time sufficient territory and sovereignty over the same upon which to build, manage, operate, defend, protect, and control said canal or for any other purposes, as the United States may deem best in its own interests.

That declares, if I mistake not, about what the Senator from South Carolina now insists upon. Yet that amendment was voted down—yeas 25, nays 45—my vote being for it. Among the Senators who voted against the adoption of that amendment was the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is present and who is taking part in this debate.

I am asking only for information, for the purpose of trying to get at the truth of this situation.

Take that amendment which was voted down declaring that the United States should have the power to acquire this territory, the very sovereignty itself of this territory, and use it in its own interest. Take that in connection with the second article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, which contemplates that the United States may build this canal directly out of their own funds. Does it or does it not appear—I have no fixed opinion on the subject—that the treaty providing for equal treatment of the ships of all nations was made in contemplation if not of sovereignty at least of absolute ownership of the canal by the United States? If so, does it not take the question out of the category of a reserved domestic question arising out of ownership and place it under the true construction of section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The amendment to which the Senator from Texas has referred and which he has just read was offered to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but not to the second.

Mr. CULBERSON. In this respect they are identical.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; in this respect they are the same. I remember perfectly well that I voted against it, because I thought—and I think that was the reason of the majority who did vote against it—that it was entirely needless.

Before I sit down I should like, if I may, to call attention to one thing in this connection. We are now so familiarized with Panama that we think of nothing else. But in the preamble of the treaty that was adopted, the actual Hay-Pauncefote treaty, you will notice that it says:

Being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise.

The route that was in everybody's mind at that time was the Nicaragua route. There was no possible prospect of our securing there what we have secured in Panama. All we could have hoped to secure from Nicaragua and Costa Rica would have been the right to build a canal. Therefore the situation contemplated by that treaty was one quite different from that which has arisen. That which has arisen was also contemplated as possible.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question right in this connection. I could not find any record to carry out the thought suggested to me in reading the paragraph to which the Senator from Texas has referred. But was there or was there not in the Senate at that time a feeling that if that paragraph were adopted, it would in a measure give the right to still further acquisition of foreign territory? It is clearly implied in the proposed amendment. Was there or was there not such a feeling in the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think at that moment there was any expectation that we should acquire any territory or any zone, owing to the conditions of the Nicaragua canal. But I also want to call attention—I am sorry to break in on the Senator so much, but if he will allow me I will not do it again—to one very important matter which is now frequently forgotten in discussing this subject.

The article in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty which most aroused the objection of the Senate, and which, I think, was an extremely perilous provision, was article 3:

The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

That was inviting the other powers to come into this hemisphere and take part in a purely American matter. I do not recall the vote on that matter in the Senate, but my impression is that when it went out it was determined decisively and without a division.

When we struck out that provision there was one thing that we made absolutely clear by our action. There was no attempt to put it back in the second treaty. That was that we did not propose to ask any foreign power to adhere to this treaty or to give any form of consent or concurrence to any rules we chose to adopt. We excluded them. Whatever was to be done was to be done by our own will and power. We agreed we would do certain things, of course; but we were to do them. There was to be nobody else to adhere or concur, or anything of that nature.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Having a wholesome regard to our Monroe doctrine.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely; and I think that goes very far as showing the attitude of the United States in ratifying the second treaty—that the striking out of article 3 showed the attitude of the Senate and of the country at that time in regard to the canal.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That we meant to make it purely an American matter?

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. As there has been some discussion as to what was the understanding at the time, possibly it will be of profit. I want to say for myself that I voted in favor of the Bard amendment, and that I was not influenced by any such consideration as that suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; in other words, the question, so far as I knew, was not raised that under the terms of the treaty as expressed we would have a right to make those discriminations, and that therefore the amendment was not needed. When the matter was up a few days ago the Senator from Massachusetts and I both concurred, I will not say in recollection, but in the failure to recollect that anything to that effect was said at that time in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I meant at the time of the second treaty. I think a good deal was said about it at the time of the first treaty.

Mr. BACON. I do not so recollect. I am not going to discuss the matter now because there are several things I wish to say which would take longer to say than it would be proper to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina. But I will take occasion later possibly to give a little more detailed narration of my recollection of the conditions and the general sentiment at that time and the reasons which actuated our votes.

I wish to say for myself now in this connection that my view at that time was this, and I still think it is so, that those who voted against those amendments were actuated by the belief that to amend the treaty was to defeat it and were not in favor of putting any amendments on. There were some of us who desired very much to so amend the treaty that the United States should be unshackled. I will at the proper time go through the various amendments that were offered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me finish this thought.

Mr. LODGE. I will not interrupt you.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will interrupt me. I simply wanted to finish my thought. The Senator knows I want him to interrupt me.

I wish to say that that was the view which I had, that the treaty did shackle us, and I wanted to unshackle it. I offered two amendments myself and I voted for two others on the same line.

I wish to say further that the Senator is doubtless correct as to the views of the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. Davis, of Minnesota, as they may have been expressed prior to the time when these treaties were before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will suspend for a moment. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I expect to ask unanimous consent in a moment that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. I ask the Senator from Georgia if I would be interfering with him if I insert a short extract in the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. I am occupying the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to finish my speech before the unfinished business is laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, inasmuch as the Senator from South Carolina is speaking on the subject, I will not ask that it be laid aside at present.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand in that case that the displacement of the appropriation is intended to continue for the balance of the day?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply want to meet the convenience and wishes of the Senator from Wyoming in every respect as to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and I merely did not ask to have it laid aside now, because the Senator from South Carolina is speaking on the question. So, having been laid before the Senate, it might as well remain before the Senate until the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina, when I shall ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. I make no comment on that, except I rather regret that the Senator from South Carolina did not inform me that he intended to speak on this particular measure. In that case we might have connected his speech with the measure itself at 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. I was proceeding to say that I had no doubt in the world that the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct in his recollection of the attitude of the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, so far as that attitude may have been disclosed by conversations which he had with him prior to the submission of these treaties, but the impression the Senator from Massachusetts has could not have been gathered from anything that Mr. Davis said at that time, because the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, was not then a Member of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is the second treaty. I am talking of the first.

Mr. BACON. He was not a Member of the Senate at the time of the first treaty.

Mr. LODGE. He was, and reported it.

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to state to the Senator the fact that at the time the first treaty was considered Mr. Towne was a Member of the Senate as his successor. I do not recollect the date of the death of Mr. Davis, but in December, 1900, Mr. Davis was not a Member of the Senate, and Mr. Towne, of Minnesota, was in his seat and voted on the question of the amendments and the ratification of the treaty. Of course, in the subsequent year—1901—when the treaty was again before the Senate, the present Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] had succeeded Mr. Towne.

I simply mention this, not in any manner to take issue with the statement of the Senator that Mr. Davis was of that opinion. I have no doubt he had so expressed his opinion, but he was not present at the time of the Bard amendment nor at any time during that session. Mr. Davis had died before that session began.

Mr. LODGE. I thought it had been earlier reported. The Senator is correct. I knew that Mr. Davis and I went to the State Department and went over the whole treaty with the Secretary of State. I had forgotten that he died in the interval before the treaty was put in. That is quite true.

Mr. BACON. I do not think I am in error in the statement that the consideration which controlled the negative vote—I do not mean to say it was what influenced everyone who voted in the negative, but the general sentiment which did control that general negative vote against the Bard amendment and other kindred amendments, two of which I said I offered myself and two others were offered by others for which I voted, which were designed to unshackle the United States and leave it absolutely free—the general sentiment which controlled the negative vote in that case was that to amend the treaty was to defeat it in those particulars.

Mr. LODGE. That is, of course, a mistake. The committee reported three amendments, all of which were adopted. It can not be said that they thought amendments would defeat the treaty.

Mr. BACON. The Senator failed to catch my last words. I said amendments in those particulars as to fortification.

Mr. LODGE. At this length of time I can only speak for myself. I know what influenced me. I wished to amend the treaty and we did amend the treaty and amended it in three different places, but I thought the other amendments were needless.

Mr. BACON. We amended the first treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Three times.

Mr. BACON. We amended the first treaty and it was rejected. I say rejected; I mean that it failed.

Mr. LODGE. England declined to accept the amendments.

Mr. BACON. England declined to accept the amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that the Congressional Directory shows that Senator Davis died November 27, 1900, and that President McKinley submitted the treaty to the Senate February 5, 1900—the first treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly, but Mr. Davis died before that session of Congress, and it was reported to the Senate in that session of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the decision as to just what was the spirit actuating the Members of the Senate at the time when these points were raised and decided of course is pertinent to the proper attitude of the Senate at that time to determine the spirit of the present interpretation of our treaty.

Mr. PERCY. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. PERCY. I expected to follow the Senator with a few remarks on the Panama Canal bill, but the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is anxious to complete the consideration of the appropriation bill, and in order to facilitate that purpose I give notice that after the morning business on Monday I will speak on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it seems that the ratification of this convention, which was subsequent to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, of necessity changed the relation of the United States in reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. When this treaty was ratified the territory through which the canal was to be constructed was owned and controlled by a foreign power. The United States and Great Britain in contracting a treaty naturally provided for mutual terms for the use of the canal. But the peculiar turn of affairs under the Roosevelt administration practically gave the United States sovereignty over the territory.

By an appropriation from our Public Treasury, by the purchase of the right from Panama as set forth in this convention giving us sovereignty over the Canal Zone, this territory is American property, in which no other nation has any more right or power than in the port of Charleston or the rivers that run into our interior.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am seeking information. I call attention to article 4 of the treaty, which provides that:

> It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The modifying word "general" in the clause read is in favor of the position I am taking. There is no general modification. It is a specific modification we are making incident to the territory having passed into the possession of the United States. The United States and Great Britain were making a treaty affecting mutual foreign territory. When this territory passed into the possession of the United States there was, of course, a modification of the relation of the two Nations to the territory under question, and that modification only affected the citizenship of the United States, which now owns the canal, and did not affect the general principle of neutrality.

The whole status of the case, as I said, was necessarily changed, and perhaps intentionally so. I have an idea, and I think the facts will bear it out that in some of the speeches of the ex-President he stated that in what some are pleased to call the scandal of the acquisition of this territory, he had this very identical object in view, and that was that it should become American territory to be controlled by America alone in American interests.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks that idea was born in the brain of the ex-President, and to remark incidentally that if it was there before he wrote the treaty, then he did a very poor piece of preparatory work in writing the treaty in the terms used.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the discussion that has arisen as to the interpretation of it in the light of subsequent events might give rise to the fact that he hoped to solve the riddle by the very act that he did.

Mr. REED. On the contrary, Mr. President, do not the facts so far as they have been recorded in a historical way tend rather to show that the steps taken to acquire the strip of land upon which the canal is now being constructed was for the purpose of avoiding the law which provided that the canal should be located at another place, unless we received certain rights from the proprietors of the Panama country, and that those rights not being ceded, the President then conspired to overthrow the sovereignty of the Government, and to set up an independent Government, with which he could deal? I ask the Senator if the evidence is not all to the effect that that was the purpose of the President, instead of the purpose to get away from the terms of the treaty?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not pretend to be familiar with the inside workings as to what brought about the raid on Colombia, but I rather suspect that there were other reasons. They have at least been intimated. There was the sale of certain property which belonged to the old canal company that also figured. But into those matters I do not care to go just now.

However, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there have been repeated efforts to have our title to the canal itself submitted to arbitration, but it has been refused. Therefore if our title to this property is not a matter of arbitration and we are satisfied that our sovereignty is complete as affecting our own people, it seems that by submitting to arbitration the question as to whether we can under the circumstances exempt our coast trade from taxation is necessarily and ultimately to bring into question our title to the canal itself, because one hinges upon the other.

I should like to call the attention of the Senate to a further fact and ask to what tribunal composed of representatives of the nations of the earth could we submit this question which would not be prejudiced against us.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the other day in touching incidentally upon this question of the sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and I had a colloquy. I told the Senator that I would put into the RECORD, as soon as I could find it, the utterance of President Taft in connection with that matter. I take occasion now to read very briefly from the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate under date of April 18, 1906, from the statement of the Hon. William H. Taft, then Secretary of War. At page 2526 of said hearings, he states:

Article 3 of the treaty provides as follows:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority."

Then he continues:

It is peculiar in not conferring sovereignty directly upon the United States, but in giving to the United States the powers which it would have if it were sovereign.

He italicizes the words "if it were sovereign."

This gives rise to the obvious implication that a mere titular sovereignty is reserved in the Panaman Government. Now, I agree that to the Anglo-Saxon mind a titular sovereignty is like what Gov. Allen, of Ohio, once characterized as a "barren ideality," but to the Spanish or Latin mind, poetic and sentimental, enjoying the intellectual refinements and dwelling much on names and forms, it is by no means unimportant. Therefore, when the question of the form of stamp was to be determined I had not the slightest hesitation in yielding to the view that we should adopt the system which for a time Gen. Davis had himself adopted before he got United States stamps of merely purchasing the Panaman stamps and crossing them with the words "Canal Zone." I do not know that it is necessary for me to go through the various provisions of the order of December 3. I have discussed them at length in my letter transmitting the annual report of the commission for 1904, and it is printed on pages 2392 to 2410 of this record.

The order, in effect, required that all importations into the Isthmus of merchandise, except those admitted free of duty for the Government of the United States or its employees under the treaty, should be entered at the Panaman ports instead of at the United States ports in order that the Panamans might collect duty on them and thus maintain their revenues. This, however, was on condition that they should reduce their duties from 15 per cent ad valorem to 10 per cent ad valorem. I deemed it of great importance that the Panama Republic should be self-supporting. Free trade between the zone and the Republic was declared. The existence of the terminal ports of the canal as ports of the United States for clearing and entering by foreign vessels was recognized. Without waiting to determine whether the Government of Panama would fail in its duty to enforce the sanitary ordinances in Panama and Colon prescribed by the United States, as was probable, the Republic turned over to the United States authorities immediate right to enforce the same. The postal rate from Panama to the United States and from the United States to Panama was made 2 cents, the stamp in the zone being the Panaman stamp crossed with the words "Canal Zone."

That is put in to fulfill my promise to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me? I did not think my recollection was quite so much at fault as the Senator from Georgia seemed to intimate.

Mr. Davis reported the treaty; he made an elaborate report with it, which I have just been looking over. He called it up for discussion during the spring. He died before the vote was taken. He died in the autumn before the Senate met again. I was perfectly certain that he debated the question in the Senate. I find by the RECORD that he reported it and made an elaborate written report.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have the references here.

Mr. BACON. I do not question at all the fact that Mr. Davis, the then Senator from Minnesota, had expressed himself on this subject, as had been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. But he reported it.

Mr. BACON. The only point I called attention to was that at the time of the offering of the Bard amendment and the vote thereon he was not a Member of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. He certainly was not.

Mr. BACON. So that he did not give any expression either in the Senate or privately as to that.

Mr LODGE. In the report, as I see by looking it over, he argues in favor of the equality of tolls to all nations, but does not suggest that the treaty prohibits our fixing any tolls as we desire. He also discusses the question of fortifications.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will certainly bear me out in the recollection that I stated in the beginning I had no doubt Mr. Davis had given utterance to such an opinion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator said it was in conversation with me—he gave utterance to it here.

Mr. BACON. I may be in error about that, but I recollect distinctly the fact—I was then a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as was the Senator from Massachusetts—that that treaty was reported in a prior session.

Mr. LODGE. It was reported on the 9th of March.

Mr. BACON. I may be mistaken about it. The secret Journal will show, but my recollection is that it was taken up in the second session in December.

Mr. LODGE. It was reported the 9th of March, with a written report by Mr. Davis; he called it up on the 5th of April; and it was discussed and the amendment was offered by the committee about the right of the United States. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina further. The Senator has been very kind in yielding. I am much obliged to him.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This is very interesting, but I should like to keep something of a connection in the argument that I am trying to make.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, right in connection with the argument he is making, I understood the Senator to say that the question of our obligations to Colombia on account of taking Panama territory, or rather what now constitutes the State of Panama, had been recognized as not to be a proper subject of arbitration. Where did the Senator get that information?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not exactly understand the statement the Senator made.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to say that the question which would arise out of our action in acquiring——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator means the ownership of the zone itself?

Mr. BACON. No; I understood the Senator to say in regard to the transfer of sovereignty from Colombia to the Government of Panama and our title to the zone through that transfer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In the speech the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made in reference to the peace treaty he made the statement, and upon his proverbial accuracy I repeated it in general but not specifically. He said in that speech that the State Department had been solicited three separate times to submit the question of the validity of our claim to the Canal Zone, and that they had refused absolutely to let that be a question of arbitration. I sent to the State Department to find specific facts in order that I might state them in that connection, but could not obtain them. In the Senator's speech to which I refer that statement is made, and, basing my remarks on the faith that I had in him, I made the statement.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, the only controversy that has ever arisen in regard to that matter was between the Government of Colombia and the United States——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand.

Mr. BACON. As to the claim on the part of Colombia that the Government of the United States was responsible for its loss of Panama, and that it was entitled to redress and so forth, I simply want to say to the Senator I am very well aware of the fact that no arbitration has been accorded Colombia on that subject; but I am unwilling that the matter shall pass unchallenged or the statement pass unchallenged that that amounts to a recognition that it is not an arbitrable question. I think it is a burning arbitrable question, and I do not think it is anything to the credit of the Government of the United States that it has refused to a weak power that can not cope with it the right to arbitrate a question of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I shall not attempt to debate the point as to whether or not as a strong power we should not submit to a court of arbitration the method by which we acquired this territory from a weaker nation. I was simply addressing myself to the fact as a precedent to what we are now attempting to do, that we claim that under the terms of the cession by Panama to the United States we do own it, and acting upon that assumption that we have no right to let outside parties come in and settle a question that is now a corollary to the settlement of that question.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to just one further point that I made a moment ago, in view of the Monroe doctrine that has now become an established rule of the nations in reference to America, and certainly would be upheld by America, this canal being within the territory affected by the Monroe doctrine, if we were to submit any question affecting us domestically as to the ownership of any territory within the Monroe zone, so to speak, the moment you did that you would open up the question to all the nations of the earth upon that precedent, and it would lead to an embarrassment that I for one at present am not willing should be submitted.

I am not discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of granting to the vessels of the United States a monopoly of coastwise trade. This is now a law. I simply am discussing whether or not, under the terms of our occupancy of the Canal Zone, we have the same rights there, in reference to our shipping, as we have in the waters strictly of the United States. If we do submit this question to arbitration we are all agreed that it will be decided against us. Therefore, if we propose to give free passage to the vessels of the United States we will be of necessity bound to remit to them whatever toll is charged. That is, we would collect the tolls from them and then rebate to the extent of the collection, which would be tantamount to a direct subsidy, different in principle and different in effect from giving free tolls.

The tolls may or may not be excessive, but to just the extent they are specifically charged upon a specific vessel, according to its tonnage, do we admit and put into practice the doctrine of ship subsidy. To open the canal for the American people and then to give all American vessels the right to go and come free is not contrary to the doctrine of building great highways which the humblest vehicle and the most expensive automobile may use. It is not analogous to nor is it in any way similar to the construction of railroads where private corporations build them. We control railroad rates in the interest of the people and grant these railroads certain rights in return for that control. The question involved in this is the question at last whether or not the United States has sovereignty over this zone, whether or not this sovereignty, being subsequent to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, changed in that particular the relation of the two contracting parties and gives us the right, both by purchase and the fact of the establishment of the Monroe doctrine, to refuse to submit to arbitration a question which, in my judgment, is purely domestic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) an act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 9, after the words "water resources," to strike out the sum "$150,000" and insert "$175,000," so as to make the clause read:

For gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States, and for the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 17, after the sum "$75,000," to strike out "to be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For continuation of the topographic surveys of the public lands that have been or may hereafter be designated as national forests, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, line 18, after the words "Geological Survey," to strike out the sum "$1,295,520" and insert "$1,370,520," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for the United States Geological Survey, $1,370,520.

Mr. WARREN. That will be changed under the authority already given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be corrected by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Mines," on page 113, line 10, after the words "mining industry," to insert "including personal service in the District of Columbia, and expenses of attendance at meetings in behalf of the purposes of this appropriation"; and in line 13, after the word "appropriation," to strike out the sum "$320,000" and insert "$347,900," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation as to the causes of mine explosions, methods of mining, especially in relation to the safety of miners, the appliances best adapted to prevent accidents, the possible improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the use of explosives and electricity, the prevention of accidents, and other inquiries and technologic investigations pertinent to the mining industry, including personal services in the District of Columbia, and expenses of attendance at meetings in behalf of the purposes of this appropriation, $347,900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think in reference to these various matters we ought to have some information. I do not like to rise and ask the chairman each time about them, but I do think in the case of these large increases some statement ought to be made, so that we shall know what we are doing. Otherwise we shall be in the dark.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator allude to the amendment beginning in line 10?

Mr. BACON. I think wherever there is a material amendment in the bill the Senator from Wyoming ought to explain it to us, because when the amendment is read by the Secretary and the announcement is made that without objection it is agreed to, what do we know about it?

Mr. WARREN. I think it is incumbent upon all Senators, after the bill is printed and is laid before the Senate for a week or two, to become advised of those things.

Mr. BACON. Oh, the Senator knows that is practically impossible.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that I shall be glad and ready to answer any questions, but if the Senator wants me to take the time of the Senate, before any questions are asked, and explain all these matters to him——

Mr. BACON. It is embarrassing to Senators to get up and challenge the committee each time.

Mr. WARREN. It should not be.

Mr. BACON. We do not like to do that, but we should like to know something about it as we go on.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Georgia does not mean to say that the chairman has shown any indisposition to explain?

Mr. BACON. Not the slightest; not at all.

Mr. WARREN. As to the particular matter of which the Senator has spoken, with reference to the investigation of these mine explosions, the Senator knows what grievous accidents have happened in the last few years. We have organized a bureau and furnished the material, among other things immense machinery for testing the walls and the surface under and over where these men work in the mines, as well as the relation and condition of mines as to the poisonous gases, and so forth. We have also arranged for rescue cars and for much material in the way of helmets, and so forth, for the rescuing parties to go into the gas-infected regions. In figuring on this matter it became necessary, in the minds of the committee, to grant the director one or two additional cars which he needed in order to cover the territory.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is that the amendment, beginning in line 10 and going down to line 14?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that is as to the amount. Now, the other amendment——

Mr. CULBERSON. Apparently $27,900 are added for the purpose of—

Personal services in the District of Columbia, and expenses of attendance at meetings in behalf of the purposes of this appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. They have no reference whatever one to the other. The amendment which the Senator has read is made necessary by a clause in the District of Columbia appropriation bill relating to expenditures for those who travel outside of the District of Columbia. These cars are taken to the mines; the miners could not go to Pittsburgh to the headquarters; so it has been necessary or thought necessary here to relieve them of that particular provision of the law, just as we relieved the medical officers of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service from it. I think the Senator from Texas is familiar with that clause in the District appropriation bill. If not, I will have it inserted in the RECORD so that he will understand it.

Mr. CULBERSON. This appropriation is increased from $320,000 to $347,900, and the language of the amendment is italicized, reading:

Including personal services in the District of Columbia, and expenses of attendance at meetings in behalf of the purposes of this appropriation.

Including that, the increase is merely for the purposes named and italicized.

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation applies back to the entire section, and it also is made necessary by the provision of law which I will insert in the RECORD in this connection when I can obtain it, if the Senator would like to have me do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, line 16, after the words "services in the," to strike out "Bureau of Mines at Washington," so as to make the clause read:

For the analyzing and testing of the coals, lignites, ores, and other mineral fuel substances belonging to or for the use of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia, not in excess of the number and total compensation of those so employed during the fiscal year 1912, $135,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, after line 19, to insert:

For per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence at a rate not exceeding $5 per day when absent on official business from his designated headquarters, and for actual necessary traveling expenses of said inspector, including necessary sleeping-car fares, $4,500.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what the term "including personal services in the District of Columbia" applies to? What is meant by that?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that in employing clerks or other employees under an appropriation for work in the field, or points outside of Washington, the law prohibits their being brought in to work here in the departments on a subject unless we especially provide for it. For instance, in the Geological Survey we have men who are in the field in the summer taking observations and making their field notes, and it is desirable to bring them in in the winter and have them complete their work here. This work about mines is done partly in the field, but in the hard weather of winter these officials can work in the District. This language is used to make the law flexible enough to allow that.

Mr. KENYON. The term is used to cover the expese and service of the field men when here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. It is designed to cover employment both here and outside, directly and indirectly, in the way I have spoken of.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator from Iowa to be making the same inquiry that was in my mind, but I did not catch exactly the drift of it. I do not understand why this matter which relates to mines and mining should have special reference, it seems, to personal service in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN. If we do not thus provide, the men might have to be furloughed and left without employment sometimes; and so it is a matter of economy to have these employees subject to service in the District or in the field.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should also like——

Mr. WARREN. It also provides in this clause exactly as the other does for the expense of attending meetings in behalf of the purpose of the appropriation; and, if the Senator will permit me, I will now ask to have this prohibitory law read.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Secretary to read the marked passage found in the District of Columbia appropriation act. It is general legislation, which covers all these departments only as we except them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 8. No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for membership fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia in any society or association or for expenses of attendance of any person at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association, unless such fees, dues, or expenses are authorized to be paid by specific appropriations for such purposes or are provided for in express terms in some general appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. I call the attention of the Senator to the last words there. The prohibition is of general application, but it allows just what we are providing for here.

Mr. BACON. What I want to know, asking purely for information and not for the purpose of antagonizing the appropriation, is this: Are the appropriations for the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of enabling them to make scientific investigations?

Mr. SMOOT. The Bureau of Mines has been regularly provided for in a special bill, and these appropriations are made to fulfill the law under the estimates which have been made.

Mr. BACON. Is that bureau provided for under another appropriation, or is this the whole appropriation for it?

Mr. WARREN. No; the work of the bureau is provided for under the several appropriations; they are divided in paragraphs, so that the application is different. That is quite general through the bill. For instance, the Geological Survey has an amount for gauging streams, another amount for minerals, and so on. It is the same with the Bureau of Mines. Money is appropriated for the bureau under two, three, or more paragraphs.

Mr. BACON. I will be very frank with the Senator. The thing that prompts my inquiry, and about which I am left without the information I desire, is this: This is a bureau which is regularly appropriated for and supported. Now, this seems to be an increase, is it not?

Mr. WARREN. No; this is the appropriation that supports it.

Mr. BACON. Then, the inquiry that suggests itself to my mind is this: Why is it that that provision was not in the bill as it came from the House, if it is an existing bureau?

Mr. WARREN. The House, for reasons of its own, considered that it would not take up that part of the estimate; but the committee of the Senate believed that it was important and so inserted it.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I do not still catch the point. This is not the sole appropriation for that bureau, is it?

Mr. WARREN. No; it is not.

Mr. BACON. Therefore, leaving it out on the part of the House was not intended indirectly to abolish the bureau, was it?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. BACON. It is my own fault, doubtless, that I do not "catch on," as the common phrase is, but I do not understand why it is that there is a regular appropriation and then why a $100,000 increase is to be added, unless there is some particular increase in the work.

Mr. WARREN. Take, for instance, the Army. We provide one amount for officers' pay, another amount for longevity pay, another amount for travel, another amount for the enlisted men, and so on. All those items go to the support of the Army. The same is true of the Navy. Now, it is within the pleasure of Congress to determine how much it will appropriate for investigations in regard to explosions in coal mines and other mines, and how much it will expend, if any, in investigations as to other kinds of mines—that is, mines of precious minerals, and so forth. The different paragraphs represent the pleasure of Congress when the bill is finished as to the amount we feel we can afford for the next year in each branch of the industry; and, of course, the Bureau of Mines is authorized to expend in the directions we indicate the amounts provided.

Mr. BACON. There is nothing indicated here, as I understand, except in the most general terms; there is no specific work indicated.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say that the appropriation of $100,000 is—

For inquiries and investigations into the mining and treatment of ores and other mineral substances, with special reference to safety and waste, including personal services in the District of Columbia—

And so forth.

In times past we have made appropriations for investigations as to the causes of explosions in coal mines, especially with relation to the safety of the miners. Then we took up the question of analyzing and testing coals, lignites, and ores. This appropriation is for the purpose of investigating as to mining and the treatment of ores; or in other words, it applies to the great mining industries of the mountain States, to determine, if possible, how low-grade ores can be handled properly and cheaply. There are to-day out in the West mountains of copper and silver ore that can not be handled successfully because of the fact that it costs so much to reduce them, but it is hoped and believed, not only by the heads of the Bureau of Mines but by those who are interested in the development of this great industry, that through these investigations ores and mineral substances of low-grade character will be brought into use and the cost of reducing them will be brought so low that millions and millions of dollars can be produced from ore which to-day is almost useless. That is the object of the appropriation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it seems to me there is a mingling of matters here which is not conducive to intelligent legislation, and I want to call attention to that fact. Of course, we understand as to the necessity of examinations into the causes of explosions and matters which relate to the disastrous and the distressing loss of life. Some years ago that matter was brought to the attention of the Senate, and I think Congress did make provision by law under which investigations should be conducted with a view to reducing this danger. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, sir; the Senator is correct in that; but——

Mr. BACON. Let me finish, if you please. I think that is a most important subject. We all recognized it to be such at that time and provided for it; but the thing that I criticize—it may be an improper criticism—is the mingling of that subject with the one which the Senator has just explained to us, namely, the treatment of ores. It seems to me they are moved by entirely different considerations, and ought not to be mingled in this way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me, if you please. If we are to have appropriations for the purpose of making investigations and providing safeguards against loss of life, that is one thing; we ought to have specific appropriations for that. If we are to have other appropriations, in a more general way, looking to an altogether different consideration, for the purpose of making scientific investigations as to the most skillful and effective way of treating low-grade ores, that is another matter; but here they are both put in the same paragraph, with nothing to divide or distinguish between the two and nothing to control those who are to disburse the money as to how much they are to devote to the one purpose and how much they are to devote to the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator will notice that the appropriation in this instance is made with special reference to safety and waste.

Mr. BACON. Safety and waste—one relates to life and the other relates to property.

Mr. SMOOT. True, the same as in the case of the appropriations for the coal mines in the East. It applies also to the mineral mines in the West. The Senator knows that there are losses of life in mineral mining as well as in coal mining.

Mr. POMERENE. May I interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I am not making objection to either one or the other, but I think the items ought to be separated. If we are going to make appropriations with a view to examinations which shall protect human life by guarding against explosions and everything of that kind, that ought to be one thing——

Mr. WARREN. They are separated.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, if we are to make another appropriation for the purpose of aiding the mining industries in scientific examinations as to better methods for the reduction and utilization of low-grade ores, that is altogether another thing.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has overlooked the fact that that is exactly what we have done. They are specifically separated.

Mr. BACON. It is all put down in the $100,000 appropriation for safety and waste; they are both put in the same line, and there is no separation that I can see.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I rose to ask the Senator from Utah a question. As I understood him, the proposed amendment applies to mines in the mountain States especially.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I made my statement too broad. It applies wherever there is mineral mining of any kind.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well——

Mr. SMOOT. I simply alluded to it in the way I did because the great bulk of it is in the mountain States.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask the Senator, Is this the first appropriation of this character for that class of work?

Mr. SMOOT. This is the first direct appropriation for that class of work. Of course, the Senator remembers that the Bureau of Mines has only been created a very short time.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that, and I think they have been doing a very good work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that just what was prophesied would take place when we created the Children's Bureau has taken place and is taking place now. It was said that that bureau would only need $29,000, but they are now asking for additional appropriations; and here is the Bureau of Mines, which started off with about $100,000, which appropriation has grown to about a million dollars, and it is still asking for more. Dr. Holmes, Chief of the Bureau of Mines, is from my own State; I know him, and he is a good man; but the bureau chiefs are constantly asking for more money. It is like the horseleech's daughters' cry of "more, more, more," and it seems to me our committee gives everybody everything they want. I am tired of the various bureaus gradually reaching out and getting more money here and there. Here is this bureau established to look after the safety of life, and now they go into the mining business in the West.

I do not think the appropriation now under discussion is proper in this bill. I do not think, in view of the reasons given for the establishment of the Bureau of Mines, that now we should appropriate $100,000 additional to enable them to go out into the West and investigate mines. If they want a mining expert, let them have it; but do not put in this bill such a provision as is proposed. I think the Chief of the Bureau of Mines has got as much as he can do to look after the matters relating to the coal-mining industry. I am opposed to this appropriation, and I opposed it in the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 1, to insert:

For one mine inspector for duty in Alaska, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, after line 1, to insert:

For per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence at a rate not exceeding $5 per day when absent on official business from his designated headquarters, and for actual necessary traveling expenses of said inspector, including necessary sleeping-car fares $4,500

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I notice that the appropriation for traveling expenses in that amendment is larger than usual. It is ordinarily $3 a day, but this provides for $5 a day.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken about that. There is only one case in which it is left at $3. As the Senator will remember, we had to raise amounts for similar purposes in other places, but in one case we left it at $3, and that was where we put in some extra men for the year only to bring up the arrears of work. This item pertains to an entirely different country.

Mr. OVERMAN. The item not only applies to Alaska, as I understand, but also applies to wherever the inspector may go.

Mr. WARREN. No; this item of $5 relates entirely to Alaska.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, is it entirely for Alaska?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it is intended to be so.

Mr. OVERMAN. And it only applies to this inspector?

Mr. WARREN. It only applies to that one place; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 16, after the word "purpose," to insert, "or the donation of any land or building, or the use of any land or building, in or near the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., that may be suitable for the experimental work of the Bureau of Mines, except that such donations shall be reported to Congress and shall involve no expenditure on the part of the Government, except as may be authorized by Congress," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase or lease of the necessary land, where and under such conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, for the headquarters of five mine-rescue cars and for the construction of the necessary railway sidings on the same, $4,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept any suitable land or lands that may be donated for said purpose or the donation of any land or building, or the use of any land or building, in or near the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., that may be suitable for the experimental work of the Bureau of Mines, except that such donations shall be reported to Congress and shall involve no expenditure on the part of the Government, except as may be authorized by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 114, line 23, after the words "Bureau of Mines," to strike out the sum "$526,600" and insert "$562,000," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for the Bureau of Mines, $562,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous objects, Department of the Interior," on page 116, after line 23, to insert:

Lease of property at Hot Springs, Ark.: The Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to lease certain premises fronting on Central Avenue and on Fountain Street, at Hot Springs, Ark., on such terms and conditions as he may determine. No lease made hereunder shall be for a longer period than 20 years. In case said premises shall be leased to another lessee than the Arlington Hotel Co. the provision of the lease ending March 3, 1912, for a valuation of and payment for the improvements made by the Arlington Hotel Co. shall be recognized by said Secretary; but he shall have the power to fix a time within which such valuation must be made, and if such valuation is not made within the time so fixed said Secretary may lease the premises free from all claim of said Arlington Hotel Co.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 117, line 15, after the words "Yellowstone National Park," to strike out the sum "$5,500" and insert "$10,140," so as to make the clause read:

Yellowstone National Park: For the administration and protection of the Yellowstone National Park, $10,140.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 117, line 18, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "one thousand," and in line 20, after the word "Congress," to insert "Provided, That this shall not apply to buildings now in the process of construction," so as to make the clause read:

No expenditure for construction of administration or other buildings cost in case of any building exceeding $1,000 shall hereafter be made in any national park except under express authority of Congress: Provided, That this shall not apply to buildings now in the process of construction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 117, after line 22, to strike out:

On and after July 1, 1912, permanent appropriations heretofore made of revenues derived from national parks shall be expended only for construction, improvement, and repair of roads, trails, and bridges, in the respective parks and for no other purposes whatever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 118, line 6, after the words "toll roads," to strike out the sum "$50,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

Yosemite National Park, Cal.: For protection and improvement of the Yosemite National Park and the construction and repair of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement of roads other than toll roads, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 118, line 6, after the words "park," to strike out the sum "$7,500" and insert "$27,500," so as to make the clause read:

Mesa Verde National Park, Colo.: For protection and improvement of Mesa Verde National Park, Colo., including the lands within 5 miles of the boundaries of said reservation, which, under the act of June 29, 1906, are to be administered by the same service established for the custodianship of the park, $27,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 20, after the word "roads," to strike out "$5,400" and insert "for the improvement of the Government road between the National Park Inn in the Mount Rainier National Park and the point where the Government road leaves the National Forest Reserve, and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey and lay out a system of roads for the proper development of the park and submit an estimate of cost therefor, $48,500," so as to make the clause read:

Mount Rainier National Park, Wash.: For protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, construction of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement of roads, for the improvement of the Government road between the National Park Inn in the Mount Rainier National Park and the point where the Government road leaves the National Forest Reserve, and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey and lay out a system of roads for the proper development of the park and submit an estimate of cost therefor $48,500.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, calling the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact, I think in a case of that kind the committee ought to volunteer information. Here is an appropriation as it comes from the House of $5,400, and, without any explanation whatever being given in the Senate, the appropriation raised to $48,500, and it is simply announced from the desk "agreed to." It goes to the country in that way and the people in the country know just as much about it as we do, and none of us know anything about it at all.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that in making up the bill—it was made up some time ago—they put in only the administration part. This is a great national reserve park that was laid out but a few years ago, and, of course, to get any use of it there must be roads and certain development. In the first year or two—perhaps two years—all that was necessary was to protect it and to do some minor things; but in order to arrange it at all so that tourists can avail themselves of it there must be some expenditure of money.

We have very careful estimates which have been sent us—and this is all within the estimates—and this represents what will go into the development of the park in the way of road building, so that people coming to the nearest point on the railroad can, by wagons or other vehicles, go into the park and obtain the benefits, as tourists do, of these resorts. These road improvements are in the nature of permanent additions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator give me some information? I should like to know how much money is appropriated in this bill to make roads through national parks for tourists.

Mr. WARREN. Of course it is an easy matter to compute.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is nearly $250,000?

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean would it be that sum altogether?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. Now, this Mesa Verde appropriation you have raised from $7,500 to $27,500.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. That case differs from some of the others. As I recall it, that is a depression or gully, and it is necessary to pipe out some of the waste water in order to protect——

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there a railroad running in the vicinity of this park?

Mr. WARREN. Not very near it, I think. The money is also to provide for roads.

Mr. OVERMAN. It may be all right to build roads in these national parks for tourists, but it does seem to me that we ought not to be spending all this money to build roads in a park situated 10, 20, or 35 miles from any railroad. How the people will get in there I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator will look it over he will find that nearly every one of the national parks is somewhere from 3 to 50 miles from a railroad. In fact, it has been the practice to forbid railroads to go into the parks.

Mr. OVERMAN. A railroad runs near to the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. WARREN. The railroad runs within 6 or 7 miles of some of the Mammoth Hot Springs and within a mile of the park limit. That is true of that park.

Now, take the Glacier National Park, and it is true of that. But the Yellowstone Park is about 65 miles square——

Mr. OVERMAN. How do you get to the Mesa Verde National Park?

Mr. WARREN. From a near railroad point. I have not the map before me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know it is some——

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no. It is within entirely reasonable distance.

Mr. OVERMAN. We appropriated $100,000 for one park, I remember, and they said they expected some of these days for a railroad to come within 10 miles of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Crater Lake Park.

Mr. WARREN. Since then an investigation has been made which shows they are building now in that direction.

Mr. OVERMAN. And expect to get——

Mr. WARREN. And the information we get from those in authority is that inside of the next 12 months they will be very near the point.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ten miles is about as close as they can ever build a road to this park.

Mr. WARREN. Ten miles is a reasonable distance in that country.

Mr. STONE. Is the Grand Canyon of the Colorado embraced within a park?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a national park.

Mr. STONE. And a railroad runs into that?

Mr. SMOOT. It runs up in the south. It runs up into the park, too; up to the gulch.

Mr. STONE. It enters the park?

Mr. SMOOT. It enters part of the land in the national park.

Mr. BACON. I should like to have some information as to what are the natural features that call for a national park at this point?

Mr. WARREN. At which point?

Mr. BACON. At Mount Rainier. What is there in there that calls for a national park?

Mr. WARREN. I think I perhaps ought to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to state to the Senator from Georgia the peculiarities and attractions of that park which entitle it to be a national reserve. It has possibly the greatest and wildest mountain scenery that we have in this country.

Mr. JONES. As suggested by the Senator from Wyoming, it is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, park in the United States. About it and in connection with it there is some scenery the equal of which can not be found anywhere else in the world.

I have ridden through the Yellowstone Park; I have been in this national park; and aside from the Grand Canyon and the geysers in the Yellowstone Park, I do not think there can be any comparison between the Yellowstone National Park and Mount Rainier Park in mountain scenery and in beauty and in all that goes to make a national park.

Now, we have provided for a road into this park. The park was set aside a great many years ago as a national park. We have provided for a road into this park, so that you can now leave the city of Tacoma in an automobile in the morning, go to the snow line, and return the same day, if you desire to make a rapid trip. But there should be one road to the mountain, you might say.

There is a stretch of this road, about 3½ miles, in the national reserve that is not improved and which is in very bad condition. The county of Pierce has macadamized a road from the city of Tacoma to the edge of this forest reserve, and last year, I think, we took in some $8,000 or $10,000 in fees from automobiles and vehicles going into the park along that road. Each year, during the last two or three years, travel through the park has rapidly increased. I think last year it was nearly double what it was the year before. But there is a stretch of this road that is now almost impassable, and unless it is repaired the people will not be able to get in there. That is one purpose for which a part of this appropriation is desired.

Then, it is very desirable, if we are going to make any improvements in the park at all, that those improvements should be made along a well-defined and well-considered plan, just as we made improvements in the Yellowstone National Park. So it is provided here that part of this money may be used for a survey, in order to determine what would be the best way to improve the park so as to get the greatest use from it in the future, and so that whatever appropriation we make will not be made in a haphazard sort of way, but with a definite object and purpose in view.

I do not know whether there is any more specific information which the Senator from Georgia desires.

Mr. BACON. That is sufficient.

Mr. JONES. I can not describe the beauties of the park. It needs to be seen to be appreciated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I am reluctant to express any dissatisfaction with anything which my good friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] desires to have done. At the same time I must say most emphatically that I do not believe in these appropriations. There are circumstances under which I think the Government is justified in setting apart these national parks, and in providing money for improvements in the way of roads and so forth.

One of them is the Yellowstone National Park. There is a wonderful, natural curiosity, and not simply curiosity, but more than that. I think, having been somewhat of a traveler myself, the greatest natural curiosity of all the earth can be found in the Yellowstone Park. I have never anywhere seen anything which approaches it.

Mr. SMOOT. Outside of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.

Mr. BACON. I was going to say that I had never had an opportunity to see the Grand Canyon, but I was going to name that, too. There are great manifestations of natural phenomena and natural conditions, if you may call a canyon a condition. So that outside of anything else that is to be found elsewhere appropriations for those two parks I think are justified. But to say that wherever we find a grand piece of scenery the Government is not only to set it aside as a park—and I am perfectly willing to have it set aside as a park; that is, to give it out of the public domain; I do not object to that—but is thereafter to be forever charged with the beautification and the improvement and the furnishing of all conveniences in connection with the use of it as a park I think is absolutely indefensible.

Now, as disclosed by the Senator from Washington himself, this is but the beginning. This is but a feature of a general plan, and the justification of it is that simply because here is a beautiful piece of scenery, a natural park, it is not only to be given out of public domain—to which I have no objection in the world—but the Government thereafter is to be charged with the maintenance of it for all time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Can the Senator tell us how the park would be used or improved unless the Government does it? This park is surrounded by a great forest reserve, and there is nobody there; there are no facilities by which it could be improved or developed; and it would be of little use unless there are some roads built, so that people can get to it. Otherwise, they must go by trail or on horseback.

Mr. BACON. Let them go that way. This, I understand, was public domain, and was set aside as a park for the benefit of the public. Am I correct?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; it was set aside as a national park.

Mr. BACON. Of course, 99 per cent of the benefit and enjoyment of the park is received by those who live in that immediate vicinity and neighborhood.

Mr. JONES and Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. BACON. Necessarily so.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me right here? The responsibility for these parks rests not with the Committee on Appropriations, but with the Senate and House which have provided them. I presume there is not one of these parks which the State wherein it is located would not be glad to take if the Government would only pass it over. It is not the begging of the States at all. They are not asking the benefit, but asking the Government to do one of two things, either to take care of its own property or pass it over to some one who will.

Mr. BACON. Have the States ever asked that they be charged with them?

Mr. WARREN. They have in some cases. They have on the floor——

Mr. BACON. I should undoubtedly vote to give them that opportunity whenever they wanted it.

Mr. WARREN. Within 30 days on this floor a Senator has asked for legislation to pass large reservations over to his State, saying that the State would accept them and pay the expenses.

Mr. BACON. You mean the parks?

Mr. WARREN. The reserves. They are all reserves of the Government.

Mr. BACON. But you are speaking now of national parks.

Mr. WARREN. I am speaking now of national parks.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator says "reservation," it is a very general term. But I do insist upon it, so far as I am concerned, that I am never going to consent and I am never going to contribute by my vote to enterprises of this kind.

Mr. WARREN. But the Senator has contributed heretofore in setting aside the parks.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether I have or not.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has not raised any point against them.

Mr. BACON. I recollect once or twice that very innocent propositions have been made by certain Senators that a certain part of the public domain be set aside for reservations of this kind. But the suggestion was then very carefully withheld that we were thereafter to be charged with the expenditure of vast sums of money to maintain good roads for these thousands of pleasure seekers in automobiles.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows that the expenditures for some of the parks have been going on for a long time, and the RECORD does not disclose that the Senator has disapproved of them.

Mr. BACON. I am glad to say the RECORD will disclose it now; and it will not only disclose it now, but whenever I have the opportunity. I except from that such reservations as the Yellowstone National Park and the Grand Canyon. But wherever a Senator may be able to get a part of the public domain set aside as a reserve park, then I am not in favor thereafter of making the Government the caretaker of it and responsible for all the expenditures that may be needed to make it a pleasure resort for those who live in that neighborhood.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there is a broader view to take of this question than merely saying that they are set aside as parks, and will cost the Government a little money to maintain. We spend, as a people, over $300,000,000 every year going to foreign lands for the purpose of travel and recreation. These parks are virtually the national lungs of our country. I think, if they are put in shape by our Government so that the people of this country can go and visit these great natural wonders—for they are natural wonders——

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator something about one of these parks.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait just a minute and then I will yield. I think then the people will visit these places a great deal oftener than they do now, and perhaps will not go to Europe quite as much as they do. But as long as it is impossible to get into the parks, as long as there are no roads there for the people to travel through the parks and see these natural wonders, the American people will not go there.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator may not be aware of the fact that we have some very beautiful mountain scenery in my own State. We have great cascades and mountains and precipices and all that; but we have to build our own roads. The Senator from North Carolina comes from a State in which there are still greater——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Government own——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a second. The Senator did not permit me to finish my sentence.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BACON. No; I was in full headway, as the Senator will see from the RECORD.

The Senator from North Carolina comes from a State the western portion of which is not to be excelled for beauty of scenery. There are some grander mountains, it is true; but it is filled with a vast expanse of most magnificent scenery, beautiful in all particulars of stream and valley and mountain and forest and everything else. It is a great resort, and hundreds of thousands of people go there every summer. But is the Government of the United States building roads to enable them to do that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Government does not own it. It does not own the land. It has no control over it.

Mr. BACON. It could own it if it wished to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Only by purchase.

Mr. BACON. If the matter of lungs were the criterion, the Government could build the roads and furnish breathing spaces for the people at less expense than if it owned the land. But, as the Senator will recognize, that is not a legitimate argument in this connection. What I am driving at is that in this vast country, with people in such remote localities, so far distant from each other, what is largely a matter of local concern ought not to be made a matter of general expense.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is not a national park or a national monument that has been created in the United States that is not a wonder in itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator about the Glacier National Park.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. The Glacier National Park is in Montana. I think if the Senator has ever been in the park or has ever seen it——

Mr. OVERMAN. I never have.

Mr. SMOOT. Or has ever seen photographs of the park, he will say that there is some of the grandest scenery in the Glacier National Park in Montana that there is in the world.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I am asking. Has the Senator from Utah been in it?

Mr. SMOOT. I have been partly through it, but not through all of it. But I have seen photographs of the park from one end to the other.

Mr. OVERMAN. I see the bill contains an appropriation of $100,000 for that park.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many acres does it cover?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, it is of large extent. I forget just how many thousand acres there are.

Mr. WARREN. It is larger than the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there mountain scenery there?

Mr. SMOOT. There is mountain scenery and there are lakes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must proceed in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are 981,681 acres in the Glacier National Park.

Mr. OVERMAN. There might be 10,000,000 acres, but I want to know the character of the scenery there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Senator to ask the direct question as to how many acres there are in that park.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did ask that direct question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have answered the question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator, but I thought perhaps the Senator could also tell me the character of the scenery.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I only wish to answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina, who asked something about the scenery. I do not know how much of a traveler the Senator has been or what he knows of the northwestern territory. But anyone who has ever visited Banff, in the Canadian Rockies——

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been there, and have stayed all night at Banff.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or Laggan——

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been there.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or Glacier——

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been to Glacier.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or Lake Louise——

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been to Lake Louise, on horseback.

Mr. McCUMBER. Anyone who has been to those places and knows anything about that country can get some idea of the character of the Glacier National Park. It is a part of that great section of the country which, I think, is included in the Victoria Park in Canada, and undoubtedly is one of the most majestic, if not one of the most beautiful, tracts of country in the entire United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it is anything like Lake Louise and that section, I have not a word to say, because I think that is the most beautiful——

Mr. McCUMBER. It is exactly the same thing. It is covered with glaciers and beautiful lakes and the majestic mountains of the Canadian Rockies,

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from North Dakota. I simply wanted to answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina. I will do so when the Senator from North Dakota has finished.

Mr. McCUMBER. While I am on my feet I just want to say another word with reference to the reason for raising this amount to at least $100,000.

Senators know that some three or four years ago we created the Glacier National Park, which was to be practically the complement of the great Canadian park. As I say, I think hundreds of thousands of people from all over the world visit the Canadian Rockies. Now a railroad has been constructed to the park from the Great Northern Railway. That railway was constructed with the idea that the Government would open up the park. In addition to the railway being constructed there, over a quarter of a million dollars has been invested in hotels during the latter part of last year and this year, and it would be ready for the traffic this year if we had this small extent of wagon roads. The department asks for $238,150. In the amount which is allowed the matter is covered by $100,000, or, say, less than one-half of what was estimated to be required. That amount ought to be allowed, at least, so that these roads may be completed and so that next year this great and beautiful park may be thrown open to the public.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the scenery in both of these parks, as has been said, is of a similar character to that around Banff, in British Columbia. The Senator from North Carolina says if that is so, he has nothing further to say in the way of objection to the maintenance of the parks. I have some photographs here which I will send over to the Senator from North Carolina in a moment, in order that he may see what the scenery is.

I understand that the Senator from Georgia, who has just gone from the Chamber, and who objects so strenuously to this park—I am sorry he is not present—makes a practice of frequently visiting the Alps, and that he gets a great deal of enjoyment and a great deal of benefit from it. If, instead of doing that, he would come one summer to Montana and Washington, and see Mount Rainier and see the Glacier National Park, he would not have any objection to the Government spending a few thousand dollars for the purpose of making them accessible to the tourists of the United States.

The Senator is a very good example of what is the general practice of so many people in the eastern part of this country. Instead of seeing their own country, at least instead of seeing it first, they spend what time they have for travel in going to foreign countries.

I want to read into the RECORD just a few words from John Muir, descriptive of Mount Rainier and the Rainier National Park.

Mr. WARREN. Will not the Senator mark the passage, and ask to have it printed, so as not to consume time?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It will take only a moment to read it. It is only a very few lines.

Mr. WARREN. All right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Speaking of the park, he says:

> In the center of it there is a lonely mountain capped with ice; from the ice-cap, glaciers radiate in every direction, and young rivers from the glaciers; while its flanks, sweeping down in beautiful curves, are clad with forests and gardens and filled with birds and animals. Specimens of the best of nature's treasures have been lovingly gathered here and arranged in simple symmetrical beauty within regular bounds.

Some questions have been asked about the size of the Rainier National Park. In answer to that, I will say that it comprises 207,360 acres. During the past year, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Interior, referring generally to the national parks, the total number of visitors to these parks aggregated approximately 224,000 as against 198,506 in 1910.

The Senator says there is very beautiful scenery in North Carolina and Georgia. I am aware of that; but it is a very different kind of scenery. There are no glaciers there. There are no ice-capped mountains. Mount Rainier is the greatest mountain—the highest mountain—within the boundaries of the United States. That in itself makes it a distinctive feature and brings it within the class which the Senator from Georgia says he would have no objection to having improved as national parks. It is of an entirely different character of natural grandeur from the Yellowstone Park or the Grand Canyon of the Colorado; but it is equal to either of those in attractiveness and in all of the benefits that come from the wonders of nature. There is just as much reason for the Government preserving it as a park and making it accessible by roads as there is for having established the Yellowstone National Park or that of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have never yet seen an item in any one of these appropriation bills, however extravagant it might be, where somebody could not furnish an excuse for appropriating the money of the taxpayers and devoting it to the end set forth in the item.

Parks, we all know, are good things to have, but I utterly repudiate the statement which has been made here that we need these parks for breathing spots; that they are the lungs of the country. When you go into the crowded districts of a great city, where hundreds of thousands and millions of people are herded together upon a few acres of ground, where the narrow streets are within the shadows of enormously high buildings that are filled like beehives with human beings, a park becomes a necessity as a breathing spot. But when you go about 500 miles from railroads, through trackless deserts and pathless mountain ranges, you are in more need of a pair of lungs capable of taking in the air than you are of a place where you can reach air, for there are nothing but air and sunshine and rocks and scenery for hundreds of miles around you. As long as time lasts there will be great waste portions of the country in the very vicinity and immediately surrounding these places. What we need there is not an opportunity to breathe. What we need is people, if we need anything to be there, to breathe the air that is already there and always will be.

These appropriations can not be justified upon the ground that we need breathing space. The question whether they ought to be made for the purpose of preserving natural curiosities is a different question. I grant that there are places in this country so romantically and exquisitely beautiful or so overpoweringly and indescribably grand that they should be preserved, but the question arises who ought to preserve them and who ought to improve them.

I can not subscribe to the doctrine that because a railroad, for its own interest in order to make money, builds a railway to one of these parks, and because a hotel company constructed a hotel hoping to make money thereby, the duty devolves upon the United States Government to build roads so that the hotel man and the railroad man may have their scheme completed out of the coffers of the Federal Government.

We are constantly extending without limit apparently the methods and devices by which we can spend the people's money. The Government of the United States is called upon to preserve vast regions of territory now, to spend enormous sums of money upon these parks. I maintain that every one of these parks that is worth preservation ought to be turned over to the State in which the park is situated, subject to the limitation that it shall remain open as a public park forever, and that the duty of improving it or building highways to reach it shall be imposed upon that State, and for the reason, as has already been suggested, that the inhabitants of the State are the ones most directly interested and most immediately concerned. Any State that has not sufficient pride to preserve at its own expense these wonderful natural curiosities, this magnificent scenery, has no right to come here asking that the people of other States who live thousands of miles from the scene shall be taxed for their benefit.

I do not believe there is a State that would not gladly accept a gift of this kind from the Government and would not undertake to preserve for the benefit of the people of their own State and the public at large these parks and reservations which are set aside not for their utility but for their beauty or their scientific interest.

So I am opposed to extending this system of spending the people's money any further. It is not just to the people of other States. There are but few of these reservations after all. Take the people of my own State. They might just as well come here and say there are some beautiful spots in Missouri—and there are. There is some fine mountain scenery in Missouri. There are some splendid rivers. There are some vast chasms. There are natural caves and canyons and all those things that have been described here. They are in almost every State. But the people of those States not only build roads through that country, but they maintain, if maintenance is necessary, the beauty and the original grandeur of these spots.

It is utterly outrageous to my mind to insist that this Government shall expend at the present time hundreds of thousands of dollars, and as the years go on millions of dollars, for a purpose which is to a large extent local to the State where the park is located.

The trouble is that once you cover money into the Treasury of the United States there seems thereafter to be a race as to who can first get his hands upon it. So every man, or at least many men, come here with the idea that he best serves his State who most liberally plucks the General Government for the benefit of his State.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator has not looked up the early history of these things or he would hardly pursue the line he is pursuing. The States did not come here and ask for these. The States do not enjoy them as against the other States. For instance, take the Yellowstone Park. There is a less percentage, I presume, of the inhabitants of Wyoming who visit that park than of the inhabitants of Missouri.

Another thing, the State did not come and ask for that park. The Government reserved it even before there was any State or even a Territory of Wyoming. It reserved it against its wish. That little Territory, in its infancy, when it collected but few thousand dollars altogether in taxes, went into the park with the permission of Mr. Secretary Teller, the then Secretary of the Interior, and expended a large amount of money. It appropriated it out of its slender funds to protect the novelties and to build a guard house and to manage it so that the despoilers would not carry those novelties away, because the Government had not then become sufficiently interested to appropriate money for the park's preservation.

Later the Government came in, and it has policed it since with a portion of the Army, and the department has come here and asked repeatedly for these appropriations. There never has been a move that I know of from my State asking for appropriations for the Yellowstone Park that the department has not asked for and insisted upon.

I presume that what is true of that park is measurably true of the others. Instead of the State being benefited by it the State is at a great loss. The Yellowstone Park is about 65 miles square, so that much is cut out of the State—a little off from Montana and a little off from Idaho—and no roads built so that they can cross over it except as the United States Government expends the money. It occurs there as a great obstacle in the way of the settlement of the country. It is there as an insurmountable obstacle to the development of that State and the two others for many miles around, if the Government does not do what a private owner or a municipal corporation would do, at least—make roads across its property.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is not a single word the Senator has said that I did not know and that everybody else did not know.

Mr. WARREN. Then I will say to the Senator——

Mr. REED. There is not a single word there that is in conflict with a solitary word I have said on the floor. I have not been arguing——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has undertaken to impale the people of these States upon—I will not say the insinuation, but upon the declaration that they come here and try to get their hands into the Treasury so that they can benefit their own States at the cost of the Treasury.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, nobody has meant to say, and no man's imagination, except that of the Senator who has just taken his seat, could ever have conceived the idea, that anybody had said that the people of Montana came here en masse and demanded access to our Treasury. But they are exceedingly well represented by the Senator from Montana who is making this demand.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to it; the RECORD will show what the Senator has said; but I insist that he ought at least not to put me into Montana and ask poor Montana to rest under that insinuation.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. In a moment. I will apologize to the people of Montana for miscalling the name of the State of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. REED. I will apologize to the Senator, who thinks that it would be a reflection upon him if he did represent Montana.

Mr. WARREN. That is an unkind remark.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator would be proud of it, and therefore would be content.

Mr. WARREN. That is an unkind insinuation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do yield, but not until I finish the sentence. Of course, I understand, as the Senator understands, that I simply misspoke the word when I said "Montana" instead of "Wyoming."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I think when the Senator comes to read his remarks about the States coming here, and so forth, he will find that I am as nearly correct as he is, and I think he will feel that he has unduly charged the procurement of these parks against the inhabitants of the States of the West.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. I shall cover that in a moment. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the subject matter upon which I intended to make a remark has been pretty well covered and explained; that is, it has been made clear, I believe, that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] does not represent the State of Montana. I merely rose to call attention to that and to say that when it comes to efficiency in procuring appropriations I wish very much that he did represent the State of Montana. We would be very glad to have him and would be proud of him.

Mr. WARREN. The State of Montana has quite an interest in the Yellowstone Park, as the Senator will remember—several miles on the southern border.

Mr. MYERS. I am not decrying the interest of Montana in the Yellowstone National Park, but on the other hand, would join hands with the Senator in trying to get a sufficient appropriation for that park.

Mr. REED. All of which only serves to illustrate the fact, Mr. President, as I asserted a few moments ago, that when it comes to getting money out of the Federal Treasury all differences seem to disappear, and gentlemen engaged in the common enterprise can act in complete harmony upon that kind of a raid even while they may differ on everything else.

Mr. President, what I was trying to say when I was interrupted was that nobody, of course, has asserted that the States have come here in any other way than as they are represented upon this floor by Senators from their States, and nobody has claimed that the State governments in any other manner have asked for money from the Federal Treasury. Everybody knows that these parks were originally set aside by the Federal Government. They were set aside for the purpose of preserving them from private ownership. But now that the State governments have been established and that those governments are fully organized, I insist that the State governments ought at this time to take charge of these parks, that the Federal Government ought to grant them to them, and that the constant drain upon our national resources ought not to be made because the parks happen to have originally been withheld from settlement and ownership by the Federal Government.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Is it the Senator's idea that the ownership of the Yellowstone Park should be turned over to the State to do what it pleases with now, or that it should be retained as a national breathing ground, a national park?

Mr. REED. The Senator was not here when I was speaking a moment ago. I said these parks ought to be turned over to the States, to be set aside for the benefit of the people as public parks, and maintained by the States.

Mr. FALL. If they shall be national parks, national breathing spots, why should they be withdrawn from the use of citizens and retained as national parks, not yielding one cent of revenue to a State? While they are national in character and for the benefit of the people of the entire Union, why should we still retain that character for them and burden a particular State with taking care of them for the benefit of the people of the Nation?

Mr. REED. I had already covered that, but I will repeat it.

Mr. FALL. I should like to hear it.

Mr. REED. Because nine-tenths of the benefit of these parks goes directly to the people who live in the State, and because other States are obliged to maintain their public parks at their own expense, if they have any.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I just wanted to correct an impression the Senator seems to have, and I know he wants to be perfectly fair. The same statement was made by the Senator from Georgia, that these parks are matters of purely local concern. I venture to say that there are individuals in the very near neighborhood of these parks who have never been on them, because they are so situated that they do not care to see them; the beauties that surround them are equal to the beauties that are within these parks. So an examination will disclose to the Senator that these parks are patronized not by local people, but by people from all over the country.

Take the Yellowstone National Park, for instance. Nearly all of the hundreds of thousands of people who go there go from other States of the Union and many of them from abroad. In addition to that, these parks are withdrawn from taxation, and the States are absolutely deprived of these immense areas in the way of benefits arising from taxation, so that sometimes they are really detrimental to the immediate locality.

I venture to say, if the Senator will yield to me for just a moment more, that with these parks under capable Federal management and control the time is not very far distant when they can be instruments of revenue rather than sources of expense to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I hope that will never be undertaken.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. One of the distinguished Senators has spoken about the lack of patronage. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia, who I believe said he had visited the Yellowstone Park, that if he would go to a number of the places that are mentioned here instead of going abroad in the summer to spend his vacation he would come back to this country and to Congress and advocate these expenditures rather than oppose them.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BACON. I have visited every State in the United States except two, and I have been in the habit of traveling all over this country ever since I was a boy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was only taking the Senator's statement for it that he had been to the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. BACON. Certainly; and I have made an express exception in favor of the Yellowstone Park. I think that ought to be kept a national park because of the tremendously distinct and rare natural phenomena. It is one worthy of preservation as a governmental reservation. I think the same is true of the Grand Canyon, although I have never been there. But if you say that every place which may have a pretty piece of scenery, or grand scenery, if you please, shall be set aside as a park and thereafter be beautified and developed at the expense of the Government, I can not subscribe to that proposition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Missouri, but I desire just a moment more.

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Organizations have been formed in the West and Middle West advising the people of this country to see America first. As a matter of fact, if our own citizens, who spend millions of dollars in going abroad and toadying to the customs of a foreign country, could be induced to go West and spend their money there we would find a perfect justification in the expenditure of this pittance by Congress for the upkeep of these different parks. And it is not long until they will be made sources of revenue. As it is they are not now, because people can not get access to them, and aside from that they are absolutely withdrawn from the support of the States by taxation.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. How would the Senator make them a source of revenue? He would not charge people to go in them, pray? I think it would be the greatest calamity to charge to go to the Yellowstone or to charge to go into the canyon of the Yellowstone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. FALL. In addition to what the Senator from Oregon has said, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the States of the Union, although deprived of any revenue whatsoever from the parks, although they are of benefit to the people of this great Union, are to-day paying the expenses of the administration of the laws over these parks, taxing themselves for it, and they derive no benefit from them. The States are enforcing the criminal and other laws at their own expenses entirely, and they certainly pay that much more for the benefits which may inure to them to have a park located within the State.

Mr. REED. The interruptions have been so long and covered such a variety of subjects that I am not going to try to follow them. However, I will notice just one thought suggested by one of the Senators, that the States ought not to be required to maintain these parks, because the States are deprived of taxes upon the land. A State is always deprived of taxes upon these parks. If the State had these lands ceded to them by the Government for park purposes, they would be without the power to tax them just the same as the city of Washington collects no taxes upon its public parks. No other city collects taxes upon its parks, and no State that maintains a park collects taxes upon its park. So there is nothing in that argument.

The Senator from Oregon says these parks will become a source of revenue to the Government. I deny that. I utterly deny it. This Government is never going to set up a tollgate and charge admission to these parks. If a State owned them, it would certainly be a most peculiar kind of State government if it would set up a tollgate and collect taxes or tolls.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment. I want to state to the Senator that the areas of these parks and reserves in some of the States are very large. Take the State of Oregon, for instance, nearly one-fourth of the area of the State is within these creations of the Federal Government.

Mr. REED. Very well. Still we would not collect tolls to enter upon that territory. They would become a source of revenue not by way of tolls, not by way of taxes, not by way of admission fees, but a source of revenue to people living in the vicinity of the parks. When you turn the tide of travel from Europe toward the great regions of the West and when you set the eyes of the people of the earth straining toward the marvelous expanses of territory where these parks are situated, then the people living in those States, the railroads running through those States, the hotels situate within those States, will be the collectors of revenue and the ones who will enjoy that revenue.

It is for that reason, I say, that the burden of improving these parks ought to be borne by the people of the States, and the States ought to be given, under proper restrictions providing for the perpetual use or preservation of the parks, the control over them, because the burden will then fall upon the localities most benefited.

I say again, if the Government is to establish these parks wherever there is a curious or interesting natural formation, then where will we put the limit? It has been stated that North Carolina and Georgia are rich in this kind of beautiful scenery. There is not a State in the Union but could somewhere or somehow rake up some places for the Federal Government to take charge of and to improve. I ask, Where are we to place the limit? I see sitting opposite me the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. He could describe to us spots in that State along the Mississippi River so exquisitely beautiful and so wonderful that he might well make an argument, if he saw fit, in favor of a national park there.

I think we have got to stop, somewhere and somehow, the leaks from the veins of the National Treasury, if I may use so bad a metaphor. Every time we try to stop it there is somebody ready with a good reason not only for the leak but for an enlargement of the leak.

I protest against the passage of these amendments.

If we want to create breathing spots for the benefit of the people of this country, then, in the name of humanity, let us go where people are who need to breathe; let us not go 500 miles from a town out into a country and create breathing spots where are the most gigantic mountains of the earth and where there will never be anything but rocks beneath the feet and blue sky above. If that is the argument, I had much sooner vote the money of the people of the United States for the creation of breathing spots in the vicinity of great cities than I would in the interior of wild and trackless deserts. But we do not propose to enter upon that policy. The truth of the matter I think we can sum up in a word. This is a proposition by which a part of the pork in this barrel is to reach the western country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I regret that I am compelled to take issue to some extent on this proposition with my good friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. He seems to have a grievance against the Rocky Mountain States because nature has blessed them with the most magnificent scenery in the country and because the Government has embarked upon a policy of establishing national parks under the control and supervision of the National Government, which therefore requires some appropriation in order to keep them up and to keep them presentable.

The Senator speaks about Missouri and Iowa not asking for any national park. I think we hear a good deal at every session of Congress about money being appropriated for the improvement of the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers. The Rocky Mountain States are not asking for any of that money. I think there are millions of dollars appropriated every year for the improvement of the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers. I think several hundred thousand dollars were appropriated at this session of Congress for the protection of the flood sufferers on the lower Mississippi River.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Speaking of the scores of millions that we are using for the purpose the Senator names and of the recent conference report on the river and harbor bill that reached beyond one score of millions, and perhaps two, the appropriation in this bill for national parks amounts to less than $650,000—not enough to fill some one hole down in the river and harbor improvement country.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator refers to the appropriation for national parks, but that does not include the expenses for all the employees of the park.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair when desiring to interrupt other Senators.

Mr. WARREN. Nearly all of this money is for permanent improvements, building roads and providing for means of transportation, which river and harbor appropriations are also supposed to facilitate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will not say that $600,000 for the permanent improvement of the roads is the whole appropriation for the national parks, for all through this bill there are appropriations for numbers of employees, superintendents, and watchmen and others for those parks.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Take the Yellowstone National Park and the thousands of men employed there.

Mr. WARREN. I invite my colleague's attention to the figures themselves. I think he will find that I am correct.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think at each session of Congress by the time the consideration of the river and harbor bill is completed, there is no section of this country and no State in the Union that has ground to complain about a few thousand dollars appropriated for the purpose of protecting and keeping up our great national parks in the West. If there is any I should like it to cast the first stone. I should like to know what State or what section or what community of the country it is.

It is true there may be scenery in Missouri, in Iowa, and in other States; there is; but they have no Rocky Mountains there. The West is the only section of the country that has the Rocky Mountains.

The Senator from Missouri says that in Missouri they have great chasms. Perhaps they have. I never saw any there. Perhaps some of the Missourians have fallen into them and become lost. I notice the last census report shows that the population of Missouri, outside of its three large cities, decreased in the preceding 10 years. It may be they have fallen into some of the chasms and become lost. Perhaps they had nobody to show them as they stumbled around over the State; perhaps they had nobody to show them the way or to shed any light for them. Possibly that may be the use to which these great chasms in Missouri, of which I never heard until the Senator from Missouri spoke of them to-day, have been put; but I am quite sure they have the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers there, and they are not slow about asking for appropriations for those streams.

Seriously speaking, it seems to me that the Senator from Missouri puts this matter on entirely too narrow and restricted a plane. He would have these parks set over to the States in which they are geographically situated and have the States keep them up; he would forbid the National Government from having anything to do with them. In other words, because a park happens to be situated within the boundaries of the State of Montana, he would turn that park over to the State of Montana and make the State of Montana keep it up. Let Missourians, if they have anybody to show them the way out there, go and see the beauties of this park.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I have had the pleasure of seeing the Glacier Park. I have been at the foot of the mountain——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, would the Senator from Kentucky object to taking the Senate into his confidence and speaking so that the remainder of us can hear him?

Mr. PAYNTER. I say I have had the pleasure of seeing a part of Glacier Park. I have been at the foot of the mountain upon which that beautiful lake is situated. I have looked at that glacier, which I think is perhaps regarded as the largest one in this country, and I therefore became very much interested in this subject. When the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Georgia suggested that the States should take title to those parks and pay the expenses of maintaining them, this question occurred to me—I did not want to interrupt the Senators then, but I should like to submit the question to the Senator from Montana—What power exists in Congress to force the States to take title to the various parks of the country and to compel them to maintain them?

Mr. MYERS. None whatever, so far as I know.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to ask a further question.

Mr. MYERS. I should have to call on the Senator from Missouri to enlighten the Senate as to that, for I can not do it.

Mr. REED. As the Senator from Montana is so facetious——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must insist upon Senators addressing the Chair and getting permission to interrupt.

Mr. REED. I was directing my——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. I am compelled to yield at present to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who desires to ask a further question. After he has done so, I shall yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I shall answer in my own time.

Mr. PAYNTER. If the answer is that the several States ought to be forced to take the burden, does the Senator know of any State in this Union that, when the Federal Government is properly bearing the expense, or improperly, as the case may be, would be willing to accept and assume that burden?

Mr. MYERS. Not unless it be the State of Missouri. The State of Missouri might; it is the only one that I know of that would.

Mr. PAYNTER. Then, if you can not force the States to accept the title, and they would not be willing to do it, is it a practical question as to whether the States ought or ought not to do it?

Mr. MYERS. I can not see that it is. Now I yield, with pleasure, to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I shall answer in my own time.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Montana, as I was one of the Senators——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. As I was one of the Senators alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], I will say that I, of course, had never suggested that the parks could be forced upon the States. The Senator would not find anything in my remarks to that effect.

Mr. MYERS. I did not understand the Senator to say that, but he said we ought to do it; and I was wondering how it could be done.

Mr. BACON. I think, as we have reserved those parks—they are not perishable articles—if the Government were simply to fail to build roads they might still be enjoyed in a great many ways to a considerable extent by the people who live in those localities, and certainly no harm would come to the Government.

Mr. PAYNTER. With the permission of the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. PAYNTER. Whether the States could be compelled to take over the national parks is hardly a practical question, even though we might desire them to do so.

Mr. BACON. If the Government should fail to build roads, the land would still be there, and it could be utilized whenever those who are particularly interested in it saw fit to do so.

Mr. PAYNTER. I am not interested in the question as to the condition of the country at all, but as to the legal question.

Mr. BACON. What legal question?

Mr. PAYNTER. The question as to whether Congress can force a State to accept title to these parks and force a State to assume the burden of maintaining them.

Mr. BACON. I have expressly disclaimed ever having intimated anything of the kind.

Mr. PAYNTER. I did not charge the Senator with having done so.

I think that came about by the Senator from Georgia unfortunately and inadvertently being aligned with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his argument, and that is one of the penalties of being put in such a position.

Mr. BACON. Well, I must let the Senator from Missouri say whether he has ever made such a statement or not; I do not suppose he ever did himself, but I am very much obliged to the Senator from Montana for associating me with such a distinguished colleague in that connection or any other connection.

Mr. MYERS. It is an honor of which anyone might well be proud.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. THORNTON. As interruptions of the Senator from Montana seem to be in order, I will ask leave to say a very few words. I had not intended to participate at all in this matter, except by my vote, which would have been cast, as it will be cast, in favor of the appropriation desired. I would say nothing now, except for the fact that it has been mentioned that the lower Mississippi Valley has been benefited in the past, and largely in the present, by appropriations from the National Treasury.

I recognize that fact and am very deeply appreciative of the generous spirit that actuated the Congress of the United States this year in making the very liberal appropriations they have made. I have not heard of any Senator from the lower Mississippi Valley objecting to the item under consideration; and I wish to say to the Senator from Wyoming, the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Washington, and Senators from other Western or Mountain States, and all other States, for that matter, that, so far as I am concerned, I will never be found resisting appropriations for the preservation and adornment of our national parks, in which I take a very great pride. As long as I am here they can depend on me for one vote in favor of that end.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Louisiana has spoken in that vein. I wish to say that I did not speak disparagingly at all of any appropriations for the improvement of the lower Mississippi River or for the protection of the good people who live along its banks or in that part of the country. Not one dollar, not one cent that has ever been voted for that section of the country do I begrudge. I love that section of the country and its people. I was born south of Mason and Dixon's line, and I am proud of that fact. I love the dear old South and always will, and not one word will ever come from me disparaging her or her people. I gladly voted for every dollar of money that was appropriated by this Congress for the lower Mississippi River and the people living in that vicinity, and would gladly vote for ten times as much; yes, a hundred times as much if necessary. I merely referred to the fact that other sections of the country, not simply the Rocky Mountain region of our country, are the beneficiaries of some expenditures from the funds of the National Treasury. I rather feel that our section of the country has been stigmatized as coming here as a beggar, as a mendicant, to get something unlawfully or improperly out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I trust it will not be deemed an act of temerity for me to engage in this discussion, but since it seems to be very largely a discussion with reference to scenery throughout the States of the West, and has been carried on with much camaraderie, I shall say that the greatest natural wonder in the world is the Grand Canyon in Arizona. We do not ask for any appropriation for the purpose of beautifying that canyon, because the God of the eternities has beautified it, but we do ask that no corporation be granted special privileges there to construct and maintain hotels to the exclusion of others.

Senators have risen and in chaste rhetoric described the natural scenery within their States. Mr. President, I direct the attention of the Senate and the Nation to the great State of Arizona, the land, some say, of the desert. In some places, if you please, it is the land of the scarlet glory of the blossoming desert cactus, but in truth Arizona is the paradise for the sightseer, the thinker, the dreamer, the scientist, and the geologist. It is a land of frequent astonishment and perpetual delight. Think of the ice caves 9 miles from Flagstaff, where, in midsummer, pyramids and stalactites of ice are found, like those that glitter around Niagara in midwinter, stately, clear, and cold. Fifteen miles from Flagstaff is to be found the Black Crater in the center of the largest lava beds in the world, where 400 years ago, in the language of Shakespeare, "diseased nature once broke forth in strange eruptions."

Some years ago I camped one summer's night high up on the southern slopes of the great San Francisco peaks. I awoke early, just as the blue lance heads of dawn were shooting up from the eastern horizon. "Here and there other mountain peaks soon began to break through the vapory seas that filled the gorges, like an island whose jutting and confounded base was swelled by the wild and wasteful ocean." I saw the unnumbered stars and their shining trains recede before lambent pillars of fire that pierced the zenith; and the moon, refulgent lamp of night, paled her silvery brightness as the curtain of day still farther lifted, and over heaven's clear azure the sun began to spread its golden gleam. I climbed to the top of Mount Agassiz, the monarch of Arizona's mountains; from the top of the mountain I looked toward the east across a silent forest of vivid green—a wilderness of verdure—to the far-famed "painted desert" which, with harmonious confusion, lay spread 100 miles away, a sea of jasper with a beach of sulphur, empurpled with celestial fire.

Cultivated persons declare that there is much pleasure and mental exhilaration derived by viewing the embellishments and accomplishments of liberty and civilization, but it seems to me that of all earthly things calculated to strike a reflective and imaginative mind, nothing can compare to the Grand Canyon which I saw 60 miles to the north with its sapphire walls that seem to prop the recumbent sky—the Grand Canyon, whose formation carries the mind back to primordial chaos, the sight of which causes the beholder to feel as if he were "treading the upper air and walking the milky way," and which brings a rapturous exhalation of spirit which only the enchanted soul may know.

The magnificence of the physical world and its resistless influence upon human character have ever been favorite themes of contemplation by those minds that discern mental and moral evolution flowing from environment; as well as themes of profound interest to those who delight in studying and attempting to solve the mysteries of nature and the enigmas of the universe.

Arizona, that wide empire of unsurpassed scenic grandeur, filled with an endless variety of natural wonders, has excited the lofty and honorable sentiments of her children and has showered an elevating and beneficent influence upon her people.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if Arizona has no national park, I am ready to say right now that she ought to have one. [Laughter.] I will ever be willing to vote an appropriation for that purpose; in fact, I will be ready to say right now that I will be willing to introduce a bill to make a national park of the entire State of Arizona [laughter], if the people of that State so desire.

I thank my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] for coming to my rescue and my aid so ably, and I believe after his remarks that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will be willing to withdraw his objections to the appropriations for these parks and devote his attention to obtaining appropriations from the National Government for getting dirt and filling up some of the big chasms in Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I will resume my argument where I left off some time ago and will complete it, if not further interrupted, in a very few words. It seems to me the Senator from Missouri puts this matter on entirely too narrow a plane. He would have the people of each State take over the ownership and control and jurisdiction of the forests and parks and to assume the expense of maintaining and protecting them; so that others, people from all over the United States, tourists from the North, the South, and the East, the rich and the poor, the great and the humble, could go there and view these grand bits of scenery. It seems to me that is an unfair proposition, and to seek to require a State to do that it seems indicates a narrow view of the subject.

I am a State-rights Democrat. I believe in State rights. But to say that the National Government has no power to maintain national parks or that it is not a proper exercise of power or a proper expenditure of money for the National Government to institute, maintain, and conduct such parks is, I think, getting back to the superlatively extreme and antiquated State-rights idea. That is too much State rights for me. That is making the State the supremely sovereign unit of government and doing away with the National Government altogether.

We must not shut our eyes to the fact that we have a National Government. Whatever the rights of the States may be—and I believe as strongly as anyone can in maintaining those rights at all hazards—to say that the Government is exercising jurisdiction improperly or expending money improperly in keeping up these parks which belong to the Government, and that the burden ought to be borne by the States is, I think, going to an unwarranted extreme.

These parks are patronized by people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Everyone may receive the ennobling educational benefits to be derived by visiting them. Everyone may enjoy the pleasure and the recreation and the elevation of ideas afforded by coming in contact with nature in one of its beauty spots. So why not appropriate a few hundred thousand dollars to keep in proper and decent form what we already have?

These parks are on our hands; we can not let go of them; we are a good deal like the man who had hold of the bear—we can not let go. What would you do? Abandon them, to become a howling wilderness? Let them become neglected and unused? We can not abandon them and simply pay no further attention to them without the sacrifice of many hundreds of thousands of dollars we have heretofore expended in acquiring and beautifying them, and without the sacrifice of one of the greatest and grandest features of our national life.

The Senator from Missouri says that they are largely of local interest to the people in the States where they are situated. I venture to say that the Yellowstone National Park is visited and enjoyed by 10,000 visitors who do not reside in Montana or Wyoming where it is visited by one from those two States combined. Not only the people of the United States get the benefit of these parks, but all humanity gets the benefit of them, and I do not think we can afford to say that, for want of a few dollars to maintain in proper form what nature has so liberally bestowed upon us, we would deny the world the grand and sublime benefits that we have it in our power to confer.

Mr. President, these remarks were simply drawn out by the expressed sentiments of my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], with whom I am usually in great and complete accord; and if this were a political proposition, I, doubtless, would be in accord with him now; but as there is no politics in it, I thought this was a good place in which to differ from him.

I will say, further, as to the policy of instituting any more parks, any new ones, that that is a different matter. Let us meet that question when it arises. That matter is not now before the Senate. The question now is, Shall we keep up in decent and appropriate form the parks we already have on our hands? I think we ought to do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, surely there is no politics between gentlemen who are engaged in a common enterprise to get somebody else's money. I do agree with the Senator from Montana when it comes to the question of politics, but he agrees with the Senator from Wyoming when it comes to the question of money. I do not know why the Senator from Montana should have taken offense at what I said. It was a pure inadvertence when I referred to the Senator from Wyoming as the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I took no offense whatever at that.

Mr. REED. I apologize now to both the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Montana, and I humbly apologize to the people of both those great States; but the thing that breaks my heart, that sends the iron into my soul, and that makes me feel that life has lost its charm and the future all its hope, is that the Senator from Montana should declare that he did not know there were any chasms in the State of Missouri. [Laughter.]

There are, sir, some chasms in that State—some great chasms—but there is one so much deeper and so much wider than all the rest that since 1893 we have thought of no other chasm but that, and that is the chasm that was left in the State of Missouri when the Senator from Montana emigrated from our State to the State of Montana. Since that time there has been "an aching void" in all nature within the confines of the State of Missouri. I say to the Senator from Montana now that for him to grow humorous about the State of Missouri seems to me to be like the unkindness of a child to its parent. When I read in his biography the statement:

> He was educated in private schools in Missouri; taught school and studied law; was licensed to practice law in his native State.

It was in that State that his mind received the training that has made him celebrated all over the West.

I know that we have not any chasms, except the one I have mentioned, comparable with those of Montana. I know that nearly all of our good people have left. I am willing to concede that in the entire flight of the years the one whose absence we feel most is the Senator from Montana. If he will only come back, we shall be compensated for all other emigration that has taken place in the past or that may take place in the future.

Mr. President, it is perfectly patent that all that has stirred Senators to this eloquence is the fact that they want some money from the Federal Treasury to go into Montana. All the jesting that may be done will bring us back to the point that this is a "pork-barrel" proposition, pure and simple. Every man who is here from a State that expects to get part of this money forgets his politics, and forgets everything else, when the money is in sight.

The Senator from Kentucky asked how we were going to make a State take this territory. If it is one-hundredth part as beautiful and magnificent as it has been described, is there any State that would refuse to accept it? And if a State thought so little of it that it refused to accept it, I would see but little use in spending the people's money for the purpose of building highways through that kind of territory. As somebody said a little while ago, this much is plain: The mountains that the Lord put there hundreds of centuries ago will probably continue to stand, even if the State does not see fit to improve the country.

It has been urged that, as we have these parks on our hands, we probably ought not to extend the system, but we should pay the expense of what we have. Why not extend the system? Why not take in the whole State of Arizona? From the word picture we have had here, all Arizona is a national park, and the Government ought to build roads clear through it. From the word picture we have had, the entire State of Arizona is more beautiful than any of the parks that have been mentioned here. Why not lay it off in parks?

Why not establish national parks down in the State of Kentucky? Kentucky has beautiful scenery. I would say she has chasms and she has cliffs, but I might offend the sensibilities of the Senator from Montana, who seems to be particularly irritated by the word "chasm."

Why not go into other States and extend this glorious system? The answer is, of course, that that will be attempted as time goes on, if the Government undertakes this task. I am opposed to it, and I am going to vote against it.

They tell us that these parks are not visited by the people of their States. If they are not, then it speaks badly either for the parks or for the people's taste.

I say, again, that if these parks are one-half what they have been described to be, they will be sources of revenue and of wealth, not to the Government, but to the people of the States. I have not any doubt that the people of the States are interested in having them improved by the Federal Government, so that every tourist who comes shall drop a portion of his money into the various enterprises of the States—into their hotels and their railroads and their other enterprises of that kind.

I have just a word to say in conclusion.

The Senator says money has been appropriated for the Mississippi River and the Missouri River, and that that does not interest his part of the country. Why, the very purpose of improving the Mississippi River and the Missouri River is to move the points where freight rates are low closer to the great country represented by the Senator from Montana. You can not cheapen freight rates through the great Central West without benefiting the land where the Senator lives.

These are public highways, maintained not for the benefit of a State nor the people of a State, but for the benefit of the country and for the benefit of the commerce of the country. It is utterly ridiculous and foolish to compare an improvement of that kind with a proposition to build highways through some wild and remote mountain district that may have been designated as a national park.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey obtained the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to say just one word in reply to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey first addressed the Chair.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me for a second?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I remarked that I knew of no chasm in Missouri, and that is true. The chasm to which the Senator from Missouri refers has been filled up and converted into a mountain, as he moved to the State about the time I left it.

Mr. REED. Oh, I was there some years before the Senator left.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I feel that the testimony of the gentlemen who have spoken is in a degree interesting. They are westerners, and live in that high mountain country. I come from a little patch of the Union whose comparative size is such that you could put 10 States like mine inside the borders of any one of theirs. Yet we have splendid scenery, magnificent rivers, and, as we call them, very beautiful mountains.

Mr. ASHURST. And will furnish the next President of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. And we are going to furnish the next President of the United States. I accept the amendment, sir.

I will say further, Mr. President, that I am so wedded in my love to the little Commonwealth of New Jersey that I have often said that we, as a Commonwealth, are nearer heaven and farther from the other place than any other part of God's humanity this creation over.

The Senator who has just spoken, my friend Mr. REED, would have you believe he is the special custodian of the people——

Mr. REED. Oh, no!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. And that no one stands closer to the people than he. I say to you that I shall vote for this measure, and that I am quite as close to the people as the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator in this body. I am as frugal, I am as jealous of the expenditures of the people's money as the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Why, yes; go on.

Mr. REED. I not only admit that the Senator from New Jersey is as close to the people as I am, but I admit that he is the people.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator is very nice and very complimentary.

I stand for frugality in public expenditure as much as any other Member of this body. I realize as well as the Senator does, or as any other man can, what money means, and how much of infinite labor and toil it means to gather it together. I shall vote for this measure because I believe it will advance the general well-being of the people of this country.

The reference to this provision as a "pork barrel" was unfortunate and most ungenerous. Heaven knows I have no thought of dipping into a "pork barrel," or that my Commonwealth shall receive in the least degree any benefit from it. I say that was a most unfortunate criticism with reference to this matter.

I was born in a congested part of the great city of New York, where we scarcely knew what a mountain was. In that day we knew little of parks. The only park I knew when I was a boy was one that could be covered by a single block. I rounded out my life on a farm in New Jersey. Physically, I had no need of looking to the mountains of Colorado or the beauties of the Yellowstone Park.

But a few years ago it was my privilege to see the canyon of the Yellowstone and the beautiful features of the Yellowstone Park—the petrified forest, and many other features that are not encompassed in this bill. I say to you that it was a source of inspiration and education to me. I felt, when I came away from there that I was a better man, a bigger and a broader man, a better Christian, and a better citizen. I believe there is no better process of education, that money can not be expended in a much better way than to open avenues and make as free as possible—not through a process of tolls, as was probably jestingly suggested—these great freaks and wonders of nature.

At that time, in the midst of those wonderful and almost appalling surroundings, I said to myself: "I feel that it is the duty of every American citizen to do all he can to make it easy for his brother and sister from the congested portions of our country to come hither and take in these glorious features that make the wonders of creation in America unparalleled in the world." And I said: "So far as I can, my life shall be spent in working toward cheapening transportation, so that the downtrodden and the huddled and herded-together masses in the great cities of our country may have the opportunity to see these great wonders that our Nation possesses in a degree unparalleled by and unlike any other portion of the globe."

Why, this is not JIM REED to-day—the great, broad, generous, big-hearted Senator from Missouri, who has no limit to his sympathy, whose love for humanity, whose breadth of character, whose genial thought we all know, whose charitable hand is outstretched to the world. He is snuffed out for a time to-day, and has taken on the cloud of the atmosphere. But, as God's sun shall shine in the near future, JIM REED's bright genius, clever, happy thought, and generous smile will come again, and he will vote for this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Wyoming challenged a statement I made here on the floor a short time ago. He stated that $650,000 was the amount appropriated for the parks. In response I asked him the question if there were not other sums appropriated for the parks besides the amount appropriated in this bill. I understood him to say there were not. I turn to page 152 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and one item I find there is an item of $1,500 for a commissioner.

Mr. WARREN. I think I reminded the Senator of that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at that time.

Mr. WARREN. That still comes within the $650,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that included in it? That was the question I asked.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then is there not, in lump sums, other money appropriated for these parks?

Mr. WARREN. No. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I had no idea of challenging the Senator's statement, except that I assumed he had arrived at his conclusion by associating with these parks the great military parks of Gettysburg, and so forth, which, on examination, I find to be the fact. Every cent that is to be expended in these resort parks amounts to just a fraction less or more than $650,000. But, of course, Gettysburg and Chattanooga and similar parks are not included. I may say, though, that, of course, in that total I do not count the pay of the men of the Army who happen to be used part of the year in policing two of the parks. That, of course, is provided in the general Army bill; they would have to be in the service anyway, elsewhere if not there.

Mr. OVERMAN. Including all those expenses it would amount to nearly $1,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. It would amount to more than a million dollars, probably, with all the other parks, cemeteries, and so forth, of which I have spoken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. REED. I raise the question of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of a quorum having been raised, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Massey	Simmons
Bacon	Gamble	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gardner	Nelson	Smoot
Bradley	Gore	Oliver	Stone
Burnham	Gronna	Overman	Sutherland
Burton	Heyburn	Page	Swanson
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Thornton
Chamberlain	Jones	Percy	Townsend
Clapp	Kenyon	Perkins	Warren
Crawford	Lodge	Poindexter	Wetmore
Cullom	McCumber	Pomerene
Fall	McLean	Reed
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shively

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been refused, the Chair is of opinion that the Senator can not again ask for them on the same question.

Mr. REED. There is a quorum here now. There were but a dozen Senators here before.

Mr. LODGE. The request was made for the yeas and nays, and they were refused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were.

Mr. LODGE. No point of the absence of a quorum was made until the yeas and nays had been refused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct.

Mr. REED. If that is the rule I submit to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the top of page 120, to insert:

Wind Cave National Park, S. Dak.: For the improvement and protection of the Wind Cave National Park, $3,100.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for a vote by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 7, after the word "bridges," to strike out the sum "$50,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

Glacier National Park, Mont.: For administration and improvement of Glacier National Park, the construction of roads, bridges, telephone lines, and the repair of roads, trails, bridges, $100,000.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second? Not a sufficient number.

Mr. REED. I did not see the few that the Presiding Officer did. I should like to have that verified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question. The Senator from Missouri demands the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment. Senators seconding the demand for the yeas and nays will manifest it by raising their hands. [After a count.] Not a sufficient number. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 8, after "Park," to insert "Oklahoma," and after the word "Interior" to strike out the sum "$5,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

Platt National Park, Okla.: For maintenance, bridging, roads, and trails, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Government Hospital for the Insane," at the top of page 122, to insert:

For cement wall about Howard Hall and shop and storehouse building, $55,209.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is this amendment, I should like to ask?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 122 it is proposed to insert:

For cement walls about Howard Hall and shop and storehouse building, $55,209.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to know what it is. What is this sum for?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it is to put a cement wall on the outer border of the grounds. This is for the criminal insane, to properly guard them at the insane asylum. The building where they are now confined opens up right out to the public. There is nothing whatever between the patients and the public except the guards. This provides for a cement wall sufficient so that in case one should escape, so far as the building is concerned, he would still be inside this wall, and could do no harm to those who might be passing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It says:

For cement wall about Howard Hall and shop and storehouse building.

Mr. WARREN. I am glad the Senator mentioned that. That is for the same branch, and for working, as far as possible, these same parties.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there an estimate?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; there is an estimate, not only for this, but for a good deal more from that quarter. I may say to the Senator that in no case have we exceeded the estimate, and perhaps in not half the cases have we gone as high as the estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Dr. White made this statement:

I think that is a matter of urgent necessity—

That is, speaking of the cement wall about Howard Hall.

I think that is a matter of urgent necessity. We have there upward of 100 insane criminals, and among those are some of the most desperate criminals in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Insane criminals?

Dr. WHITE. Yes; and we have there some of the most desperate characters in the United States. Occasionally there have been escapes from that building. That building has been made as safe as it can be made as it stands there now. The department has investigated the situation by special committees, and special reports have been made, and the Secretary himself has recommended that certain additional safeguards be placed there. If the insane criminals are going to be cared for in Washington, it is believed that every effort should be made to make the criminal building more secure, because there is not any place in the world that would dislike more to have a criminal insane person loose than Washington.

Then he goes on and describes what it is really for and what it will cost.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to mention another fact. I see this bill carries the provision that charges up the District with $769,536.09 as their legitimate——

Mr. WARREN. That is the sum that is computed to be due from the city on account of the parties we have mentioned, and others.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the city's proportion?

Mr. WARREN. The city's proportion as it has been determined.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And this bill begins the practice of requiring the District and the city to pay their full proportion for sustaining this hospital?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that really is an innovation.

Mr. WARREN. This is for the arrears up to the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the plan is in the future, of course, to follow that practice?

Mr. WARREN. I assume that to be true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 122, after line 2, to insert:

For the construction and equipment of five tubercular cottages, to accommodate 20 patients each, with concrete foundation, outside finish of stucco, on wooden studs, inside plastered, including furniture for the same, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 122, after line 6, to insert:

For new barns, piggeries, silos, and for storing food for animals, $50,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will not the Senator from Wyoming give us a little explanation of this item?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that there is a regular list of improvements that were needed at the insane asylum, and while the committee could not traverse the argument that they were all necessary they felt that these were highly necessary. For instance, the amount of milk used is such that they would be unable to procure it anywhere within a radius that would give them good, fresh milk. Therefore they have to utilize a large number of cows, and at the present time they have no shelter except a tumble-down old wooden structure. By constructing something cheaply, but of cement, and making it sanitary, they will be able not only to produce their milk cheaply but to guarantee the quality of it. Coming to the pigs, they have had disease among them because they are not properly provided for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What amount of land have they in the rear of the hospital?

Mr. WARREN. I am not able to tell the Senator offhand. I should have to examine the record about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They have land on which they can keep cows?

Mr. WARREN. Plenty of it. As the Senator knows, it is across in the country quite a little distance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have visited it a number of times. With that explanation I do not myself object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Columbia Institution for the Deaf," on page 122, line 15, after the word "grounds," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs to the buildings of the institution, including plumbing and steam fitting, and for repairs to pavements within the grounds, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Howard University," on page 122, line 19, after the word "university," to insert "and for ice and stationery," so as to make the clause read:

For maintenance of the Howard University, to be used in payment of part of the salaries of the officers, professors, teachers, and other regular employees of the university, and for ice and stationery, the balance of which shall be paid from donations and other sources, of which sum not less than $1,500 shall be used for normal instruction, $57,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On page 122, line 22, at the end of the paragraph, I move to strike out "$57,400" and insert in lieu thereof "$60,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 10, after the word "shelving," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500," so as to make the clause read:

For material and apparatus for chemical, physical, and natural-history studies, and use in laboratories of the new Science Hall, including cases and shelving, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, after line 13, to insert:

Authority is hereby granted to Howard University to construct, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and without expense to the Government, a tunnel or conduit under W Street, in the city of Washington, D. C., from square 3,067 to square 3,073 in order to connect the buildings of Howard University, located on the latter block, with the power, heating, and lighting plant of Freedmen's Hospital.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask if an independent heating plant could not be put in for less than the cost of the tunnel?

Mr. WARREN. There is no cost at all for the tunnel. They are not asking for any appropriation.

Mr. REED. I thought it was carried in the $89,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is the footing of the items that come before that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 23, to increase the total appropriation for the Howard University from $89,400 to $92,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Freedmen's Hospital," on page 124, line 2, after the words "in all," to strike out the sum "$32,040" and insert "$33,040," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and compensation of the surgeon in chief, not to exceed $3,000, and for all other professional and other services that may be required and expressly approved by the Secretary of the Interior; in all, $33,040. A detailed statement of the expenditure of this sum shall be submitted to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 124, line 13, after the words "In all," to strike out "$64,040" and insert "$65,040," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $65,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under the Department of Justice," subhead "Public buildings," on page 124, line 25, after the word "penitentiary," to strike out ": Provided, That not exceeding $3,500 of the above appropriation of $100,000 shall be paid as compensation in any form for the services of any architect or architects," so as to make the clause read:

Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans.: For continuing construction of the new United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., $100,000, to be available immediately and to remain available until expended, all of which sum shall be so expended as to give the maximum amount of employment to the inmates of said penitentiary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 125, line 9, after the word "penitentiary," to strike out ": Provided, That of the appropriation of $75,000 herein made not exceeding $3,000 shall be paid as compensation for the services of an architect," so as to make the clause read:

Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga.: For continuing the construction of the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., $75,000, to be available immediately and to remain available until expended, all of which sum shall be so expended as to give the maximum amount of employment to the inmates of said penitentiary.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it seems that we are paying the architects there too much. The appropriation for the building is $100,000. The House provided that his pay should not exceed $3,500. The bill provides "and for service of the architect"——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we ought to strike that out.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so either. It seems that they have already had plans for the building, and it says for continuing the construction of it. The House thought that 3½ per cent would be sufficient for the architect, and it seems to me that that is enough.

Mr. WARREN. I may say that it proposes to limit the architect's fees in two cases. One case is at the Atlanta Penitentiary and the other is at Leavenworth. My attention and the attention of the committee was first drawn to the fact that in one case they allowed $3,000 for $75,000 and in another case they allowed $3,500 for $100,000. In looking further we discovered that there is a contract duly entered into, signed by the United States, through its proper officers, and by these architects, providing for a certain percentage.

In looking to see what was said of the matter when it was before the House the debate discloses that they were not entirely certain about the contract. The committee felt that we should strike it out and take it up in conference with the House conferees and weigh the contract and see whether it can be set aside or not, because the contract plainly indicates exactly what they shall have, which is a certain percentage.

Then, again, the committee on this side felt that it would like to have some explanation as to why the amount for architects should be about the same in both cases, where the building expenditure was to be $75,000 in one case and $100,000 in the other.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us put it at 3½ per cent.

Mr. WARREN. One is for an expenditure of $100,000 and the other is for an expenditure of $75,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose, following the House in the case of the appropriation of $75,000, we make it 3½ per cent.

Mr. WARREN. I would prefer that we should not follow the House until the matter of the contract has been looked into more fully.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think that anyone has power to make a permanent contract with an architect binding this fund?

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly; it is a contract just the same. There is no question in my mind, and there is no question, I think, in the mind of anyone who has examined it, but that those architects could collect from the United States in the Court of Claims whatever the amount may be, less or more, under that contract.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By what authority could they contract in advance for architects' fees to be taken out of unappropriated money?

Mr. WARREN. The contract is just the same. The original appropriation provided that these buildings should be built under continuing appropriations. It is the same as in the case of appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors and for public buildings. These architects entered into a contract after due consideration, the same as the men who furnished the material for the buildings. I am not asserting that the House may not have had the information, which they can give us, but there was nothing developed in the debate and there is nothing in the RECORD to show that they had given due weight to the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to repeat my question to the Senator. By what authority can anyone make a contract with an architect to pay a percentage on work for which no appropriation has ever been made?

Mr. WARREN. Appropriations were made when this contract was made to start the buildings and to carry them along. Furthermore, we have what is called the Tarsney Act, which provides especially for contracts for employing architects.

Mr. CULLOM. On continuing contracts.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; on continuing contracts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we should change the provision in the House bill, and when we come to the appropriation of $3,000 we ought to make it conform to the first and limit the architects' fees to 3½ per cent. Contracts could be made by private individuals very easily at this rate.

Mr. LODGE. Contracts made by private individuals with architects for architecture and superintendence are 5 per cent everywhere. Of course, I know the Government ought to pay less than anybody else, but, as a matter of fact, that is what everybody else pays and I can not see why we should not pay it. Of course, the result of a reduction will be that we will get bad work; that is all.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that we have just stricken out from the bill the repeal of the Tarsney Act, which I voted against. I think the House put this in because it had repealed the Tarsney Act. If it had not been for the Tarsney Act no contract could have been made, because the architects of the Treasury Department, who are salaried men, would prepare the plans. But under the Tarsney Act they have the right to make these contracts, I understand, whether an appropriation has been made or not. If they have made a contract under authority of law, then we ought to be bound by it. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that we can ascertain that fact by leaving it in and letting it go to conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say one word in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is, no doubt, true that a private individual making a contract for his entire architectural work would pay 5 per cent, but we have our organized architectural force in connection with the Treasury Department. That ought to have been the place in which the plans were originally drawn, and the additional architectural work ought to be associate work. The pay then by a private citizen would be only one-half of the regular charge of 5 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous objects, Department of Justice," on page 125, after line 15, to strike out:

That no part of any appropriation made under this act for the following purposes, namely, conduct of customs cases; defending suits and claims against the United States; detection and prosecution of crime; defense in Indian depredation claims; enforcement of antitrust laws; suits to set aside conveyances of allotted land, Five Civilized Tribes; enforcement of acts to regulate commerce; for payment of assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases; and for payment of such miscellaneous expenditures as may be authorized by the Attorney General for the United States courts and their officers; shall be used for the payment of any salary, fee, compensation, or allowance in any form whatever to any person who holds any other office, place, position, or appointment under the United States Government, or any department thereof, or to anyone hereafter appointed, designated, or employed, who within two years next preceding the date of his appointment, designation, or employment has held any other office, place, position, or appointment under the United States Government or any department thereof.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have some reason given for striking that out. It seems to me that it is a good provision of law not to allow pay in addition to salaries. Congress fixes the salaries. Why should they allow the Attorney General to take money from a lump sum and give it to a lawyer who is already paid by the Government upon a salary?

We have a general law that a man shall not hold two positions in the Government and receive two salaries. The House provision which we have stricken out here provides that the Attorney General shall not compensate a salaried officer of that department. He contracts to work for the Government at a certain salary, and I think he ought to be bound by that.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is correct only as to part of that statement. If the Senator will read the last part, he will find that under this provision it would be impossible for the Government to employ anybody who had gone out of the service at any time within two years.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to strike that part out.

Mr. WARREN. One moment. We have cases where a man may be employed as attorney in the department and he may leave; but his books and his memory, and so forth, and his examinations might be valuable in some case where the Government might afterwards be compelled to employ an attorney, and we ought not to provide that in a case like that they could not employ him until after two long years had elapsed since his separation from Government service.

I want to say to the Senator that I have taken some pains to ascertain the idea of the House in putting this in. I find that it is this: There have been cases reported where an officer of the Government on a salary of perhaps $5,000 has resigned, and very soon afterwards, or immediately, has been given a class of work in which he has made many thousands of dollars. I think they reported in the hearings that in one case over $60,000 was given for less than a year's work.

As far as the first part of it is concerned, I think we can find a way, undoubtedly—if we do not adopt it here—of arranging it in conference; but it was put in in this way on the House side. Afterwards the House sent over here and asked that the bill be returned, to have the enrolling clerk insert something that they had left out. In discussing it, especially with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is not present, he agreed with me that we ought to strike out and find in what way we could avoid this last part and yet retain the spirit of the first part.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am opposed to the first part. I care nothing for the second. I think what the House tried to do, they had in their mind, perhaps, a case where an Attorney General, who was receiving a salary of $7,500, was paid from $80,000 to $100,000 additional. If it is a common thing that the Attorney General of the United States, receiving $7,500 can have money taken out of a lump sum and be paid $10,000 and more and $20,000 more, and in one instance $80,000 more, I think this is a good provision of law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While he still holds office?

Mr. OVERMAN. While he still holds office. It is being done every day. Men whose salaries are provided for in the legislative appropriation bill at $7,500 and $5,000 are being paid extra allowances. That is what the House is trying to stop.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not mean the Attorney General, because his salary is $8,000. The Senator perhaps means an Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. OVERMAN. I meant the Assistant Attorney General. I did not mean the Attorney General, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two parts of this paragraph which the committee recommend be stricken out. The first has reference to the payment of fees out of special funds to men already employed and regularly salaried. It can not be, I think, that any Senator would approve such a course. It seems to me that that part of the paragraph certainly ought to be retained. I shall not object to striking out the latter part upon the theory that perhaps something better than the latter part may be expressed in a more satisfactory manner, but as to the first part I feel sure that we ought not to strike it out.

Therefore, I ask for a division of the question on the motion to strike out. The division should be as to whether we strike out the portion ending in the middle of line 7, on page 126, and also whether we strike out the portion below that.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator, if he will read it again, will not end in line 7.

Mr. OVERMAN. Line 6.

Mr. WARREN. Line 6.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Line 6, down to the word "or."

Mr. OVERMAN. After the word "thereof."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. After "thereof," in line 6. I think we all agree that down to the second word "or," in line 6, the paragraph ought to be retained. So far as I am concerned I would not object to striking out the latter part.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to clearly understand this provision. As I read it the lines from 16 to 22 do not refer to those who are in the Government service:

That no part of any appropriation made under this act for the following purposes, namely, conduct of customs cases; defending suits and claims against the United States; detection and prosecution of crime; defense in Indian depredation claims; enforcement of antitrust laws; suits to set aside conveyances of allotted land, Five Civilized Tribes; enforcement of acts to regulate commerce;

Then it goes on to say:

For payment of assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys.

That is separated by a semicolon and is clearly distinct from that which is at the beginning.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me? I understand the idea that prevails with the Senator from Georgia, but I want to say to him that while I appreciate the feeling of those who oppose striking this out, and sympathize with them, at the same time I have so many times in conference found the conferees very much embarrassed where we had stricken out a part of a paragraph and left intact the remainder that I think the Senator will be better pleased if he will permit us to strike the whole out. Then we can commence to build and would not be embarrassed with part of it, these recitations, and so forth, because they refer to a lot of appropriations. On the House side they have able lawyers to represent them in the conference and personally I expect to be guided largely by the views they will entertain. On that conference, by the grace of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who has asked that his colleague on the committee, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], should be on the conference, he will be there; and he of course is an able lawyer. In order to get it before the conferees with liberty to accomplish exactly what we want and eliminate the other he thought we had better strike it all out. He left that word while we were considering it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am sorry the Senator from Texas is not here to discuss the subject.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose we lay it aside until another time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed for the present.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 2, after the words "Attorney General," to insert "and for telegraph and telephone service, including also not to exceed $10,000 for necessary employees at the seat of government," so as to make the clause read:

Detection and prosecution of crimes: For the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States; the investigation of the official acts, records, and accounts of marshals, attorneys, clerks, and referees of the United States courts and the Territorial courts, and United States commissioners, for which purpose all the official papers, records, and dockets of said officers, without exception, shall be examined by the agents of the Attorney General at any time; for the protection of the person of the President of the United States; for such other investigations regarding official matters under the control of the Department of Justice as may be directed by the Attorney General, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, and for telegraph and telephone service, including also not to exceed $10,000 for necessary employees at the seat of government, $400,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What increase is that? I can not tell.

Mr. LODGE. It is no increase whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Now I send to the desk an amendment to come in on page 126, line 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 126, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "$30,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$35,000."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What line is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Page 126, line 19.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can not tell instantly what it means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming also submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 126, line 25, change the total so as to read "$87,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, line 5, after the word "government," to strike out the sum "$200,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to make the clause read:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, including not exceeding $10,000 for salaries of necessary employees at the seat of government, $300,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That appears to be a considerable increase.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that is a matter of allowing $300,000 instead of $200,000 to enforce the antitrust laws.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, line 23, after the word "Washington," to strike out the sum "$10,000" and insert "$25,000," so as to make the clause read:

Enforcement of acts to regulate commerce: For expenses of representing the Government in all matters arising under the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, including traveling expenses, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, including salaries of employees at Washington, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, before we take up the next amendments I desire to state for information that we have in the next six paragraphs simply put in what we understand the law requires. The law passed last year requires that certain Federal court reports shall be printed in specified number and furnished to certain officers. We have intended to follow exactly that law.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 11, to insert:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, $715.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before disposing of that amendment, may I ask—I know the Senator has explained the matter—but does law provide as to the prices that shall be paid for these books?

Mr. WARREN. It does.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, does that amendment refer to advance sheets of the Federal Reporter?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Those are the volumes that are furnished to the different courts?

Mr. WARREN. They are furnished to the different courts mentioned in the law. The law states distinctly where each shall go. Would the Senator like to have the law read? It is quite long.

Mr. BACON. I may be mistaken as to the particular matter in my mind, but I recall that the Judiciary Committee has had before it for several years a bill for the purpose of having certain reports furnished to the various Federal courts. The Senator from Minnesota is familiar with the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the provision under which this amendment is drawn is in the judicial code, which, if the Senator will remember, was in charge of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and his joint committee.

Mr. BACON. Then, this is not the matter which I had in mind. The Senator from Minnesota knows to what bill I refer.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not understand that it is.

Mr. BACON. This is a different matter.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Usually when one subscribes for the Federal Reporter they send the advance sheets for nothing.

Mr. WARREN. That may be, but they do not send them in this case, perhaps, as the prices named seem to be considerably lower than regular commercial rates.

Mr. OVERMAN. If they are subscribers to the Reporter, they do get the advance sheets. There is an appropriation here of $74,000 for additional books authorized to be furnished under the judicial code.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will excuse me, it seems to me the only safe way was to follow the law on this matter, which is absolutely specific.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the Senator has followed the law exactly, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. WARREN. I certainly meant to do so, and I hope the Senator will verify that, and if wrong we will correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator intended to do so, but I think that the law does not require that these books be furnished to the district attorneys.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is an item, on page 131, appropriating $38,000 to furnish United States district attorneys copies of the Federal Reporter. I do not think existing law provides for that, and I should like to know about it. We furnish all these reports to the courthouse where the district attorney has to attend the court. They are in the various court libraries. We furnish them to the judges, and generally the district attorneys have them anyway. I do not suppose there is a reputable attorney who is competent to occupy his position who does not have these reports, the Supreme Court Reports, and others, and I think that it is a useless expenditure of money to send advance sheets of the Federal Reporter and Digest to the district attorneys and to appropriate $38,000 for that purpose. I do not believe there is such a requirement in the law, although I am satisfied the Senator would not state there is unless it is so.

Mr. WARREN. We will have the law read as soon as we find it, and if I am wrong the Senator can correct me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator thinks it is required by law, but I believe it is rather a recommendation of the department.

Mr. WARREN. We had a recommendation of the department, as the Senator says, for $38,000, which, unless through an inadvertence, has not been put in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think even if it is the law, we ought not to send the district attorneys these reports, because they are available to them in every courthouse in this country; they are available in every town and every reputable attorney has them. In my opinion, the appropriation of $38,000 to send the district attorneys these books as they come out ought not to be made. It is in the interest of the publishing company, as Senators on the Judiciary Committee know. Representatives of the publishing companies are around here every year trying to get their hands in the Treasury, and there is a bill pending now to send to all the courts of this country, as the Senator knows, all the reports of the District of Columbia, which will cost several thousand dollars a year. I think even if it is the law, we ought not to make the appropriation. That is the way to repeal the law. The representatives of the publishing companies come here and want Congress to appropriate for sending this reporter and that reporter to various courts, and the suggestion is now made to send out the reports from the District of Columbia. We have had this matter before the Judiciary Committee and refused to recommend the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand, the provision of the law regarding this item is found in section 229 of the judicial code where it is provided—

> The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued, and distribute a copy of each such reports and digests—

Then it gives a list of the officials to whom those reports are to be distributed and provides how the distribution shall be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does it include district attorneys?

Mr. SMOOT. And then at the end of the section is this language:

> And the Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the back and current volumes of such reports and digests.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This appropriation is not for current reports, as I understand, because they do not cost any such sum.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that I hardly understand the matter in the same way the chairman of the committee does. I understand that a contract is made for furnishing the Federal Reporter, and this amount of $715 is for the advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, or, in other words, it is an advance of $715 on the contract for the printing of the Reporter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. Every lawyer who subscribes for the Federal Reporter has the advance sheets sent to him free. I have taken it since the publication started.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true; but, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. About half a dozen volumes come out each year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the Code of Law, and there is absolutely no word in it about advance sheets. Everything else is there.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator have the law read and let us know what it is?

Mr. LODGE. If there is anything else there, it will appear when the Secretary reads it.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to know about it.

Mr. LODGE. The requirement for advance sheets is not in the law, but the other matters are provided for.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does it require the publication to be sent to the district attorneys?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I move to strike out the two items in which appropriations are made for advance sheets. Every lawyer knows very well that the Federal Reporter system furnishes to its subscribers advance sheets free.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say in regard to this matter that I think my colleague [Mr. NELSON] knows something about these reports and with reference to their being put in the bill; and, in view of his absence at this time, I suggest that the item be temporarily passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the law had better be put in the RECORD, even if it is not read, because my recollection is that it does not mention the district attorneys, although I am not sure about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before this matter is passed, I call attention to the fact that the provision on page 130, in lines 8 to 11, contains an appropriation sent us by the other House providing for the purchase of these current volumes. We have the appropriation to keep up the sets in the various offices and that appropriation carries the advance sheets. I think all of these amendments in italics ought to go out or, rather, that none of them ought to stay in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina ask that the law be read?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I shall ask that it be printed in the RECORD if this item is going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the law will be inserted in the RECORD.

The provision of the law referred to is as follows:

> SEC. 229. The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter, or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued, and distribute a copy of each such reports and digests to each place where a circuit court of appeals, or a district court, is now or may hereafter regularly be held, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Court of Customs Appeals, the Commerce Court, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Interstate Commerce Commission; and to the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than three sets each. Whenever any such courtroom, office, or officer shall have a partial or complete set of any such reports, or digests, already purchased or owned by the United States, the Attorney General shall distribute to such court room, office, or officer, only sufficient volumes to make a complete set thereof. No distribution of reports or digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of the courts (except the Supreme Court) to which the reports and digests are distributed under this section, shall keep such reports and digests for the use of the courts and the officers thereof. All reports and digests distributed under the provisions of this section shall be and remain the property of the United States and, before distribution, shall be plainly marked on their covers with the words "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving them to their successors in office. Not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the back and current volumes of the Federal Reporter or other publication purchased under the provisions of this section, and not to exceed $5 per volume for the digest, the said money to be disbursed under the direction of the Attorney General; and the Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress, an estimate for the back and current volumes of such reports and digests, the distribution of which is provided for in this section.

Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Minnesota is now in the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was before the committee, and I will say to him the question now is on the first amendment of the committee to the bill at page 130, appropriating $715 for advance sheets of the Federal Reporter. It is claimed that that is not proper under the law and that it is not necessary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the law provision has been made for the issuance of the Federal Reporter and the digest of those reports with advance sheets to the several courts and officials, practically the same officials to which the United States Supreme Court reports are issued. Under the law the Attorney General is required to present an estimate each year of the cost of those reports. The Federal Reporter is furnished at the rate of $2 a volume, while the Digest, which is a larger book and consists of a digest of a large number of volumes, is $5 a volume. The rates are very reasonable.

In connection with the Federal Reporter I will say that the Federal Reporter is issued in monthly or periodical sheets, as fast as the decisions are published. The decisions first are published in pamphlet form and are sent out to these officials. Afterwards, when a sufficient number has accumulated to make a volume, they are bound and they get the bound volumes. This amendment is simply to provide for advance copies to be sent them from time to time as they are published.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that the bar of the country generally, I think, subscribes to this Federal Reporter system, in whole or in part; and it has been the practice of the publishers for years, and is now, to send to every subscriber for their bound volumes the advance sheets without any additional charge or cost whatsoever.

Mr. NELSON. I know that they pay more for the reports than $2 a volume. What the Government pays for them is only $2 a volume. I do not know what their price has been in recent years, but when I was a member of the bar I had to pay from $4 to $5 a volume for them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They do cost the members of the bar, I think, more than $2 a volume.

Mr. NELSON. I have not been in active practice of the law since I became a Member of the Senate, but before that time my recollection is that we had to pay for the bound volumes of the Federal Reporter from $4 to $5 per volume. I am informed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], who has been in active practice, that members of the bar now pay $3.50 per volume for them; but that includes the advance sheets. The Government gets these Federal Reporters for $2 a volume, with this slight addition for the advance sheets, which makes it much cheaper than the price for which the bar now gets them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, the advanced sheets involve no additional cost to the publishers, and I supposed that universally they went to whomsoever subscribed for the bound volumes, whether they get the bound volumes at a special rate or whether they get them at the rate which the bar pays.

Mr. NELSON. So that for these volumes the members of the bar now have to pay $3.50 a volume, and they get the advance sheets. The Government pays $2 a volume for its books and then a slight additional price for the advance copies, which, taken together, is much cheaper than the price for which the profession gets these reports. That is my understanding of the matter. These items in the appropriation bill are exactly in conformity with the estimates of the Attorney General. Under the statute he is required to send in estimates for the exact cost of these reports.

Mr. LODGE. What would be the effect of having only the House provision?

Mr. NELSON. The effect would be that there would be no provision for the advance reports at all.

Mr. LODGE. These officials could not get them?

Mr. NELSON. It would be a direct violation of the law. Every Government official, every judge, and every other higher official needs these books. Next to the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, they are the most valuable reports among the profession. I know when I was in active practice that, next to reading the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, my attention, outside of my own State supreme court, was largely devoted to the Federal Reports.

The present system is a great improvement on the old system. In the old times we only got these reports as the volumes were published. It was oftentimes six months or a year before we got hold of a decision. If we wanted one, if we wanted the information, we would have to send to the clerk of the court and get a certified copy and pay quite a little bill for it. Under this Federal Reporter system the decisions of the courts are published in pamphlet form as fast as rendered. Then, when enough have accumulated to make a bound volume, they are bound, and in that way preserved. They are very valuable to the profession. This amendment is exactly within the estimates.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, Mr. President, I thought I was right about it——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has read the law, and I want to correct him about one statement about which I thought I was right. The law does not provide for sending these reports to the district attorney.

Mr. NELSON. No; that is correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all I am contending for.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that the Senator is correct about that, and the misapprehension came up in this way: In the estimates they provided for these attorneys, and also provided for a number of other things. I cut those out, but the clerk in making up the bill misunderstood me and neglected to omit that part of it. He left the other cut out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I surrender the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota, who is especially familiar with this reporter system, its headquarters being in his State: Is the $715 intended exclusively for the advance sheets of the Federal Reporter? How many advance sheets of the Federal Reporter are there in a year? They do not publish more than two volumes in a year, do they?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Seven hundred and fifteen dollars a year for two volumes?

Mr. NELSON. They publish sometimes three and four volumes of the Federal Reporter in a year. The Federal Reporter includes all decisions rendered by the lower Federal courts, by the nisi courts, and the courts of appeals—all decisions except those of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand what the Federal Reporter is, but I do not understand why these advance sheets should cost $715.

Mr. NELSON. I do not know what is the cost of it. It was a part of the estimates which the Attorney General sent in.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Neither do I understand about the Federal Reports and Digests. The West Publishing Co. publish a large number of reports, but this applies only to the Federal Reporter, and there is an appropriation of $2,860 in the annual report for the Federal Reports and Digests. It seems to me that the provision requires some explanation. I suppose it covers a large number of copies probably for different offices. Perhaps that is the explanation.

Mr. NELSON. It covers practically the same offices and the same courts as the Supreme Court of the United States. I can not undertake to enumerate all of them. It covers all Federal judges of the higher and lower courts; it covers the heads of the departments; it covers, I think, some copies that are sent to each House of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that he can ascertain from the statute to whom the copies are distributed.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. It should be borne in mind that these books remain the property of the United States. They do not pass to these individual judges or other officers at all.

Mr. WARREN. No; they are Federal property. They do not belong to these officers; they belong to the office, and whenever a judge retires or some other official retires, the books belong to the office and his successor. They are the property of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, the item here in regard to district attorneys is clearly in excess of the authority of law. The question was considered when we were framing this legislation in the joint committee, and the district attorneys were excluded after thorough investigation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to call the attention of the chairman to what appears to be a duplication. I am not satisfied, however, that it is a duplication. But lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 130, and lines 23, 24, and 25, on the same page, appear to cover advance sheets for the same period, one item being $715 and the other $850. Why are they put in that form. It is for the same period. This language is in the latter clause, "to remain available until expended."

Why were those words left out of the paragraph in lines 12, 13, and 14?

The facts are this national reporter organization is a conspiracy to get all the money that the country lawyers of the United States earn. They have to rent more office room for shelves for these books. Every sort of opinion, whether it is an unnecessary repetition of fundamentals that are known among men everywhere, is printed and sent out, and the bar is mulcted for it, and I think it is beginning to get its work in on the United States.

About two-thirds of their printed decisions ought in some way to be eliminated from the record, because they are mere repetitions of doctrines that have been held over and over from the beginning. And yet men with small incomes, country lawyers, who do not have access to large libraries, as lawyers do in the cities, and who must maintain their own libraries, are the victims of this conspiracy to compel them in one way and another to buy this countless number and constantly growing number of publications.

I think we ought at least not to duplicate these items. In lines 12, 13, and 14 is an item which reads as follows:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, $715.

Then in lines 23, 24, and 25 there is this:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912—

Exactly the same period; and advance sheets of the same report, but with this language added—

To remain available until expended, $850.

Mr. WARREN. That is precisely the way it came here in the official estimates of the department, and I am of the opinion that there is an error in one of those dates, because as the items appear here on the face of the bill the Senator from South Dakota is right, that they would cover the same time, and the only difference is in the language at the end and in the amount appropriated. Of course, if it were a mere duplication, it would not necessarily read that way. There would not be any difference in the amount.

I think it is an error in the matter that came to us, and that through inadvertence we have copied it here. However, it may be simply a division, and if it is desired to have the sum of the two, I will have it looked up. I have the estimates before me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I remarked when I yielded the floor temporarily, some time ago, there is just criticism of all of these proposed amendments. The duplication suggested exists in other parts of the committee amendment. In line 11 it is proposed to appropriate $2,860 to purchase Federal court reports.

Mr. OVERMAN. And digests.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And in lines 19 to 22 an appropriation is made of $3,400 for Federal Reports. Provision had already been made in the House bill to purchase the Federal Reporter to keep up the sets which the United States Government owns.

Now, I join with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in expressing my appreciation of this publication known as the Federal Reporter. I think it would be improved if they would leave out most of the district judges' opinions, for their circulation frequently contributes to judicial error throughout the country. I think it would be improved if it was limited to the decisions of the court of appeals. But be that as it may, as published it is a valuable and a necessary work in lawyers' offices.

I have found in the United States court buildings which I visited, wherever I inquired for them, two sets of these books, with the stamp of the United States on them, indicating that we have two sets, practically, everywhere—one in the district judge's office, and one in the district attorney's office. I do not think there is any necessity for buying additional new volumes. I think the Government certainly ought to keep up the volumes for the use of the district judges, and perhaps for the use of the district attorneys, but not go beyond that. In my purchases of these books, my experience has always been that a certain price was fixed for the books, and the advance sheets came as an incident to the purchase of the books. Yet in the proposed amendment we provide twice for buying the advance sheets, and provide twice for buying the reporters themselves.

We have no explanation of these apparent duplications.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just for a moment, if it is to ask a question; but not to take any considerable time, as I wish to finish this criticism.

Mr. HEYBURN. All right. I was about to remark that it has just occurred to me that this seeming duplication may be because they are providing for the purchase of the reports of the circuit courts of appeals, which are distinct and separate, and also for the Federal Reporter, which contains those decisions with others. I think probably that is where the mistake is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We certainly do not want to buy both of them.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator that my recollection is that when we purchased the Reporter we got the bound volumes at a certain price, and if we wanted the advance sheets we had to pay a little bit more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I always made the minimum contract for the Reporter, and they threw in the advance sheets.

Mr. JONES. I always made a contract for the bound volume and the advance sheets, too; but I understood that if I wanted to make a contract for only the bound volume I could get it a little bit cheaper. I think that is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, I wish to go on with my criticism.

Lines 15, 16, 17, and 18 appropriate $74,000—

To pay for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

Then, on page 131, is an appropriation of $38,000 to buy Federal Reporters and digests to be furnished to United States district attorneys.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the chairman of the committee has stated that the item of $38,000 is there by an error.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not so understand.

Mr. LODGE. I understood him to make that statement.

Mr. WARREN. I made that statement. I do not wish to blame anybody about it; but in the subcommittee the chairman of the Appropriations Committee naturally deferred largely to his associates, who are learned in the law, and it was determined to put in nothing but what was in the law. In the hurry of business the clerk of the committee understood that he was to leave out the part that accompanied this $38,000 which provided for amending the law, and not to leave out the amount. So it came in there by inadvertence. As to these seeming duplicates, as I have already said, the estimate which comes up from the department——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, I have not finished my criticisms. I have some more to make.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I can help the Senator to finish them. I am criticising myself a little.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not at present yield to the chairman of the committee. I wish to finish my criticisms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I was only going to explain——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is not explaining what I want to hear about just now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have called attention to the fact that lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, on page 130, apparently provide for all the money that is required by the judiciary act. Then, on page 131, comes $38,000 additional. Then, following that, is $96,309 additional:

To pay for complete sets and additional volumes, as issued, of the Supreme Court Reports and digests thereof, authorized to be furnished under sections 227 and 228 of the act, etc., to remain available until expended, $96,309.50.

There is $96,000 more to pay for complete sets and additional volumes. I think every district court judge has in his office a set of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think every district attorney has; and I do not understand why that appropriation for additional volumes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States is embodied here.

Mr. LODGE. That last clause, of course, as the Senator sees, comes under two different sections—227 and 228. It is not under the same section of the law. It does not come under section 229, which covers the Federal Reporter. It is a different matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One is the Supreme Court decisions and one is the Federal Reporter?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the first, in lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, is "to pay for additional books."

Mr. LODGE. I had not read those two sections—227 and 228—and I wanted to see just what they required, and whether they give a list of the persons to whom the books shall go. I find they give a long list of persons to whom the Supreme Court Reports must be furnished. Section 228 fixes the price.

Mr. CRAWFORD. At how much a volume?

Mr. LODGE. It fixes a price of $2 each for volumes heretofore published, and $1.75 each for future volumes. Then it says:

The Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the current volumes of such reports and also for the additional sets of reports and digests required for distribution under the section last preceding.

Those are for the newly established courts and offices of that kind. I should think it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will pardon me, there have not been enough newly established courts to require an expenditure of $96,000 or anything like it.

Mr. LODGE. No; but when the Attorney General is required to furnish them so extensively as he is required to here—I will not read this long section, 227—I should think it must require a good deal of money to supply them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then what is the $74,000 for?

Mr. LODGE. That refers, as I understand, to the additional volumes of the Federal Reporter. I do not understand that has anything to do with the Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should think so. It says "additional books authorized."

Mr. LODGE. That comes under section 229, a different section, and refers to the Federal Reporter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no, Mr. President; I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the proposed amendment no reference is made to the section, so it is impossible to tell which one it refers to.

Mr. LODGE. The language is:

To pay for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 * * * $74,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is right.

Mr. LODGE. Section 229, which I have before me, refers to the Federal Reporter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The other provision refers to sections 227 and 228. That is a totally different thing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I am opposed to spending so much money for these books. It is unnecessary.

Mr. LODGE. The section first authorizes the purchase of complete sets of the Federal Reporter for certain courts, and then requires the Attorney General to distribute to all other courts sufficient copies to make complete sets. That is what the $74,000 is for. It is for additional volumes to complete the existing sets, as I understand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me for a moment, I want to read section 229; and I want to say that before the enactment of that section there was a prior law, and this is carrying out a prior law on the subject.

Section 229 reads as follows:

The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter—

That meant not only the Reporter to be published after that, but back numbers—or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued.

So this contemplated not only provision for purchasing current volumes but also back volumes of the Federal Reporter in bound volumes, which never had theretofore been furnished to the courts. What officials and judges had them at all had them because they had bought them at their own expense. I read again:

SEC. 229. The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued, and distribute a copy of each such reports and digests to each place where a circuit court of appeals, or a district court, is now or may hereafter regularly be held, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Court of Customs Appeals, the Commerce Court, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Interstate Commerce Commission; and to the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than three sets each.

For each House—

Whenever any such court room, office, or officer shall have a partial or complete set of any such reports or digests, already purchased or owned by the United States, the Attorney General shall distribute to such court room, office, or officer only sufficient volumes to make a complete set thereof. No distribution of reports or digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of the courts (except the Supreme Court) to which the reports and digests are distributed under this section shall keep such reports and digests for the use of the courts and the officers thereof. All reports and digests distributed under the provisions of this section shall be and remain the property of the United States, and before distribution, shall be plainly marked on their covers with the words "The Property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving them to their successors in office. Not to exceed—

Here is the price—

Not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the back and current volumes of the Federal Reporter or other publication purchased under the provisions of this section, and not to exceed $5 per volume for the digest, the said money to be disbursed under the direction of the Attorney General; and the Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the back and current volumes of such reports and digests, the distribution of which is provided for in this section.

This law contemplated not only getting the current volumes from time to time to complete the back numbers of the Federal Reporter in bound volumes for these officials, and the Attorney General has sent in these estimates. A part of them—if Senators will read them they will see—are for the current volumes that will come in during the current fiscal year, and a part of them, the large amount, is to pay for back numbers of the Federal Reporter in order to complete the set.

There is one item here in regard to which I will be very frank with the Senate, and that is the first item in italics:

To pay to the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, $715.

There seems to be no reference to those advance sheets in this section of the judicial code. My recollection—but I may be astray—is that in the law we passed—there was a law preceding this—provision was made for issuing these advance sheets. Now, no provision is contained in section 229, that I have just read, about distributing these advance sheets. It may be that it is outside of the law in that respect. I am not clear about that. My recollection is that when we first passed the law providing for the distribution of the Federal Reporter we provided for the issuance of advance sheets, while this section does not.

I was on the Judiciary Committee when this matter was pending before the enactment of the code, and I remember very well how we beat them down in price. My recollection is that at that time the regular bound volumes cost about $4 a year. One Senator says to me $3.75 and another Senator says to me $3.50. At all events, we dickered with them and finally got them to agree to furnish the regular volumes of the Federal Reporter at $2 a copy and the digest—and all lawyers know the difference between a digest and the regular report—at $5 a volume.

As I said, all these items are clearly within the estimates and within the law, with the exception of that first item. As to that, my recollection is that it was under the original law, but I may be mistaken. Perhaps the senior Senator from Georgia will have some recollection on the subject.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; my attention was diverted at the moment. I ask to what he alludes?

Mr. NELSON. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that when we first passed the law and it was before the Judiciary Committee providing for the purchase of the Federal Reporter, in that law we made provision for the securing of advance sheets, as it is called.

Mr. BACON. I do not recall now. I simply recollect the fact that we made provision for the Federal Reporter.

Mr. NELSON. I made a statement about it, and I said the only paragraph of the bill that I am in doubt about myself is that first item of $715 for the advance sheets of the Federal Reporter, as to whether that is within the purview of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is mistaken about that. Provision for furnishing it to the district attorney is not in the law at all.

Mr. NELSON. No; I do not claim that it is; and that is not included in these estimates.

Mr. WARREN. It is in the estimates.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. It is in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I do not so understand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is at the top of page 131.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will yield a moment, it might be better if he would take a little time and look this matter up. As it is nearly time to adjourn, if it meets the convenience of the Senator, I will ask that this matter may go over.

Mr. NELSON. Very well. I think the Senator from North Carolina will remember when this legislation was first passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator from Minnesota give me his attention for a moment, that I may make a suggestion to him?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. While these items have been passed over so that they may be investigated a little further, I wish to call the Senator's attention to what appears to be two duplications on page 130.

Mr. NELSON. What are the duplications?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I call the Senator's attention to the paragraph in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 on page 130 and lines 19, 20, 21, and 22 on the same page, the first being a paragraph appropriating $2,860 and the second a paragraph appropriating $3,400, both of them apparently relating to the same thing.

The next duplication is in lines 12, 13, and 14 on page 130 and lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 130, the first being for $715 and the second for $850, and both apparently being for the same thing. I simply call the Senator's attention to it so that he may investigate it before we come to consider these items again.

Mr. NELSON. These two items, the $715 item and the $850 item, may be, as the Senator says, duplications; but the other two intervening items are not duplications at all, because one relates to the current volumes that were reached during the currrent year and the other relates to completing the full sets.

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think it is a duplication, for the reason that the $715 is in connection with the item just above it, and the $850 is in connection with the item just above that, and they are in about the same proportion. So whatever has been estimated for one and whatever reason it is estimated for will be found to be so with the other item.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We want it cleared up.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it is proper that it should be cleared up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judicial," subhead "United States courts," on page 132, line 8, after the word "Alaska," to insert "and the eastern district of Oklahoma," so as to read:

For payment of salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including the office expenses of United States marshals in the District of Alaska, $1,400,000, to include payment for services rendered in behalf of the United States or otherwise, and including services in Alaska and the eastern district of Oklahoma in collecting evidence for the United States when so specially directed by the Attorney General.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he expects to proceed with its consideration on Monday?

Mr. WARREN. I was just about to give notice that I will ask the Senate to take up the bill on Monday next immediately after the routine business.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it will be impossible for me to be in the Senate on Monday, and I have an amendment in which I am somewhat interested which I should like to offer. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming and the Senate to indulge me that I may offer it at this time.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania be permitted to offer his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be offered. It will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 55, after line 14, insert:

For installing mechanical stokers and otherwise improving the boiler plant at Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., $13,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is within the estimates, and as far as the chairman is concerned he is willing to accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to a statement that I desire to make. Some years ago we opened what was known as the ceded Red Lake Reservation under a law which provided that the lands should be sold and the proceeds turned over to the Indians. A portion of those lands were swamp lands. We obtained an appropriation of $35,000 to survey the swamp portion of the ceded reservation. There remains in the Treasury $4,500. In pursuance of the survey under the law passed by the State and Federal Governments about a thousand miles of drainage have been constructed and over a million dollars expended by the county authorities. Adjoining these lands remain a portion of the unceded reserve, which is also swamp. The Indians have signified a desire to have the swamp lands surveyed and drained that they may take their allotments there and leave the timberland as tribal or communal property. This action was taken after the Indian appropriation bill was reported; and as I expect to be called away Monday I am going to ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill to let me offer an amendment to come in after line 21, page 106, following the item for the opening of Indian reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 106, after line 21, insert:

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the completion of the drainage survey of ceded Indian lands made by the act of April 30, 1908, be made available for an extension of the drainage survey to the Red Lake Diminished Reservation, with a view to determining what portions thereof may be profitably and economically reclaimed by drainage, so as to be made suitable for agricultural purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received and agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask permission to print the following letter in the RECORD in connection with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1912.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: By various acts of Congress, to wit, act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 352), act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., 1033), and act of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 82), a total of $35,000 was appropriated for the drainage survey of the ceded Chippewa Indian lands in Minnesota, which was to be repaid by an increase of 3 cents per acre in the price at which the unsold land was to be sold (act of May 20, 1908, 35 Stat. L., 169). Under date of March 6, 1912, the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office writes that $2,838.03 has been collected and turned over for this purpose.

On page 28 of the report of the drainage survey (H. Doc. No. 27, 61st Cong., 1st sess.) it appears that the unsold ceded Indian lands which were raised in price by said acts amounted to 2,735 square miles, or a total of 1,750,400 acres. If all this land should be sold, the 3 cents per acre increase would amount to $52,512. We have no reports as yet of the sales for the last year, but I have information from the local land office that the sales have been large and that since the drainage operations began the demand is very great. There appears to be no doubt but that more than the total expenditure for the drainage survey will be reimbursed from the 3 cents per acre increase.

The Red Lake Indians in council have recently passed resolutions asking for the sale of the timber on the unceded diminished reservation, and that a part of the proceeds of the timber sale should be used to reclaim by drainage the untimbered lands which are generally swampy in character but susceptible to drainage. Before authorizing such a work, however, it would be advisable to cause a drainage survey to be made, so as to have reliable information as to feasibility of the work.

There is, under the above appropriations, an unexpended balance of $4,557.09 which the Indians desire to be made available for the extension of the survey to the swamp lands of the Red Lake Diminished Reservation.

I respectfully ask that the desired authority be given immediately, in order that the survey may be made before it freezes up and that Congress may be informed in the premises at its next session. Many of the Indians are anxious to take agricultural land as allotments, but as most of the lands, in their present condition, are too wet and swampy for successful agriculture, this step seems absolutely necessary at this time.

Very respectfully, H. STEENERSON.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, July 30, at the close of the routine morning business, I will seek to address the Senate on the subject of high prices—the high cost of living.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to have the following order read at the Secretary's desk, and I ask that it be passed over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 24153) to amend and reenact section 5241 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the same be laid before the Senate for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will lie on the table and be printed.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. FALL. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, the 22d instant, immediately after the routine morning business, I will address the Senate on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment, and on the substitute therefor reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Senator will arrange his convenience so that his speech will not interfere with the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. FALL. Certainly. I do not want it to interfere. For that reason I have not taken up the time of the Senate before. It is a matter of very great importance.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 22, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The names of the absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SIMMONS responded to his name when called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CATRON. I present certified extracts from the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of New Mexico, containing a complete record of all the proceedings in the senate and house relating to the election of my colleague, Hon. A. B. FALL, by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913. I ask that the extracts be placed on the files.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper sent to the desk seems to be a transcript of the action of the two bodies of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, and credentials in the usual form are omitted. If there be no objection, the Chair will refer the paper to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21477) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 7027) to prohibit the interstate transportation of pictures of prize fights, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3815) to amend an act entitled "An act to require apparatus and operators for radio communication on certain ocean steamers," approved June 24, 1910, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ASHURST. I have received a great number of petitions and memorials relating to the Owen bill, Senate bill No. 1. I ask that a few of these petitions and memorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions and memorials were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the Mohave County Medical Society, held on May 28, 1912, the following resolutions were adopted and are respectfully submitted:

Whereas Senate bill No. 1, known as the Owen bill, is soon to be voted upon; and

Whereas a very large proportion of the deaths throughout the country are due to preventable causes, a condition that is a disgrace to modern civilization, and needs corrective measures; a country's most valuable asset is the health of its citizens, and its most important product is its children; therefore does it behoove us to see that the health of our citizens is maintained and our children given their rightful energies by means of sanitary conditions;

Whereas it has been fully demonstrated that preventive medicine has made it possible to save lives by organized and coherent efforts, such as the world has witnessed in Cuba and the Panama Canal Zone, without which organization such efforts would have been futile. We believe that this stands as an example of what could be expected within our borders, by limiting preventable diseases if the efforts of our physicians were directed by proper organization such as the Owen bill contemplates;

Whereas our Government has appropriated vast sums of money for curtailing diseases among horses, cattle, hogs, and plants, and no adequate sum for the conservation of the health of its citizens; and

Whereas the opponents of the Owen bill have claimed that the intent of the measure is to make a "medical trust" which will preclude a citizen from employing a medical advisor of choice; we refute this argument of the patent medicine vendors and of those sects professing to heal, who have no knowledge of sanitary conditions, and will not report contagious diseases as set forth in our health laws. And inasmuch as the object of this bill is to prevent disease and is of a strictly sanitary nature, without any reference whatever to the treatment of disease, it is evident that their argument is selfish, and purely mercenary without any idea of public welfare: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Mohave County Medical Society petition the honorable Senators for the State of Arizona to give the Owen bill their most hearty support.

W. H. BUCHER, M. D., President.
A. M. COWIE, M. D., Secretary.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., July 17, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senator from Arizona, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of July 11 might be interpreted in two ways. It is plain, however, that you are unwilling since your election to put yourself on record as being in favor of the conservation of the public health, as provided by the Owen bill. Are we not justified in assuming that those who are not for the Owen bill are against it?

Yours, sincerely,

ROY E. THOMAS.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., July 17, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of the physicians of Arizona who is interested in the protection of the public health, I am writing to urge you to do your utmost for the passage of the Owen bill. If you will analyze the opposition to this bill you will find it comes from patent-medicine manufacturers and venders, manufacturers of adulterated foodstuffs, and people who wrongly interpret the purpose of the bill. I do not know of a single well-informed voter, outside of the classes above mentioned, who does not favor the measure. Trusting that we can depend on your help in this matter, I remain, Yours, very truly, JOHN HIX THOMAS, M. D.

TERRITORIAL ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT,
Phoenix, Ariz., July 3, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senator from Arizona, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the name of an ancient and honorable profession I respectfully ask you to give the Owen bill your careful consideration; and, having done so, I feel assured that you will register a vote against those who are using every means to discredit the profession by playing on the ignorance of the public and playing to religious and sectarian prejudices.

I believe that you, as an educated and intelligent man, will exert your influence on the side of progress and health.

Inclosed is a clipping from the January 13, 1912, Journal of the American Medical Association on "Why the Owen bill should pass."

Thanking you for your interest in this legislation, I am,

Very truly, yours,

G. W. STEPHENS, M. D.,
Assistant Superintendent.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., July 9, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senator from Arizona, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

I have a communication from one of the physicians of the State in which the statement is made that over your signature you wrote the following: "I note with pleasure that you approve Senator OWEN'S bill for a department of health. During my campaign I pledged myself to vote for Senator OWEN'S bill and, of course, I shall certainly do so." Having made a campaign pledge of this character, one naturally wonders what influence has been brought to bear that would lead you to say that "I am especially anxious that you do not even infer in any way that I am to be committed for or against this bill."

If the politicians were as much in earnest in their efforts to protect the health of the people as are the physicians we would very quickly have such a revision of the health laws as would equal, at least, those covering the preservation of health of live stock. I am satisfied that a great majority of the people of Arizona approve of this measure.

Yours, truly,

ANCIL MARTIN.

ARIZONA FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Prescott, Ariz., July 15, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ASHURST: It was with some surprise I read a transcript of your letter to Dr. Ancil Martin.

Lying before me is your letter under date of April 17, in which you say "During my campaign I was pledged to vote for Senator OWEN'S bill and, of course, I shall certainly do so."

I am wondering if my belief in you will be justified.

Most cordially, yours,

AGNES MCKEE WALLACE,
President Arizona Federation of Women's Clubs, 168 S. Marina St.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition adopted at the yearly meeting of Friends for New England in conference at Vassalboro, Me., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ACCOUNTS OF LATE MORTON E. CRANE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 20th instant proposing to appropriate $654.29 to credit in the accounts of Morton E. Crane, secretary and disbursing officer of the Immigration Commission, being the amount disallowed from his accounts by the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

RECORDS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7157) to make uniform charges for furnishing copies of records of the Department of the Interior and of its several bureaus, and I submit a report (No. 952) thereon. A similar bill has been introduced in the House, and it is very desirous that it shall become a law at the present session of Congress. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand that this bill is reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. SMOOT. It is reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. And that the provision in reference to fees and the other provisions of the bill have been approved by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. The entire bill has been approved by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH MICHIGAN.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4012) to authorize the exchange of certain lands with the State of Michigan, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 953) thereon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Unless the bill shall lead to discussion I shall not object, but I reserve the privilege to do so. I wish, however, to say that at this late time in the session it will be necessary, I think, to adhere to the order of business, after this matter is disposed of.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is there a report on the bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir; there is.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator from Washington that the bill has passed the other House, was favorably reported upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and also by the Secretary of the Interior, both agreeing to and approving all of its provisions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The general object of the bill is to make an exchange of public lands within the State of Michigan. What is the purpose of making the exchange? The State of Michigan is to convey certain lands to the Government, and in lieu thereof the Government is to convey certain lands to the State of Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to get the Government lands now used for forest purposes and the State lands in a compact body.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are now intermingled.

Mr. HEYBURN. It applies only to Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. It applies only to Michigan.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On Saturday I moved the adoption of an order with reference to House bill 24153. I wish to ask that the Secretary read that order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator postpone action until the morning business has been concluded, if agreeable to him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I was under the impression that it came up as a part of the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the conclusion of the morning business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 7345) granting an increase of pension to Ophelia A. Comstock (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $39,000 for completing the reestablishment of the light and fog-signal station marking Thimble Shoal, Chesapeake Bay, Va., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. SANDERS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 364), which was read:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 10, Sixty-second Congress, being the United States bankruptcy law of July 1, 1898, and amendments thereto to June 25, 1910, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire immediate action on the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has no objection, I should like to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Printing. We have printed a great many of these documents, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on July 20, 1912, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1152. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield;

S. 6084. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6934. An act to provide an extension of time for submission of proof by homesteaders on the Uintah Indian Reservation; and

S. 7002. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant to Salt Lake City, Utah, a right of way over certain public lands for reservoir purposes.

THE PARCEL-POST SYSTEM.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. I wish to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the parcel-post system.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course there can be no objection to notices for making speeches. I hope, however, that the Committee on Appropriations will be allowed to have the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill finished without serious interruptions. I want to say again that unless the Senate is willing——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for a moment.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Georgia will let me finish what I was saying.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Only I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I have no idea of taking the floor from the Senator.

I desire to say—and I wish Senators would take it home to themselves—that the passage of the pending appropriation bill is only one step in its progress. When a large bill like this of 200 pages with hundreds of amendments passes the Senate, it takes a long time afterwards to consummate the legislation. Unless we are permitted to finish it soon, we might as well provide for staying here all summer and have our winter clothing sent to us. We must allow these bills to go through or we must spend the summer here. That is all there is to it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as I have given notice that I should address the Senate this morning, I suppose the Senator from Wyoming desires to call my attention also to the importance of passing the sundry civil appropriation bill. I for one recognize, I think, the importance of the passage of this bill at the earliest possible moment, and I am one of the Senators who take as much interest in it as does the chairman of the committee himself. At the same time, Senators possibly have their own ideas as to other matters of importance, and I certainly should not, under the circumstances, have given notice that after the routine morning business this morning I should address the Senate upon any subject had I not believed that that subject was one of supreme importance. I now want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that while I shall assist in every possible way in facilitating the early passage of this bill, at the same time, to my mind and that of the people whom I in part represent, the subject upon which I shall address the Senate is of supreme importance.

Mr. WARREN. I had no special reference to the Senator from New Mexico. What I said I desired to apply generally in the nature of a supplication that Senators might refrain, as far as they can, and give me the floor until we can finish the appropriation bill.

LIMIT OF VISITORIAL POWERS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I fully realize the importance of pressing through the appropriation bills to which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has referred. The motion I made on Saturday for the order, which is contained in the RECORD, comes up automatically this morning for action. If it can go over until to-morrow morning and preserve its place, I shall not press for a hearing this morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he would be willing to allow it to go until Wednesday morning so that the chairman of the committee may be here?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I find that he will return on Wednesday, and I should be much indebted if the Senator would allow that matter to go over until that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am perfectly willing for it to go over until Wednesday morning without prejudice to its rights.

Mr. LODGE. I mean, of course, that it go over without losing its place.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well, without losing its place, until Wednesday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BACON. Did the Chair submit the request for unanimous consent and state that it had been granted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did.

Mr. BACON. We certainly had no opportunity for its consideration with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on the floor claiming the courtesy of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware of that fact. The Chair will repeat the request. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall not enter an objection to unanimous consent to take up the appropriation bill, but I shall insist at the very earliest possible moment in delivering myself of the message which I have, and which I think will be of some interest at least to the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 132, line 22——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, on Saturday afternoon we passed over until this morning amendments on pages 130 and 131. I think the Senators who were interested in that matter are all present now, and I wish to say to those who were discussing it on Saturday afternoon that the chairman of the committee has taken it up with the Department of Justice and investigated the matter further. On page 130, commencing at line 8 and running to line 11, an appropriation is provided for bound copies of the Federal Reporter for the present year and the future to be distributed among 150 United States courts, for which the appropriation of last year provided the back numbers. The department finds that under the law there are 310 courts eligible to be provided with these volumes, but there is a stipulation that they must have proper vaults or buildings in which to store them, and it has been found on examination subsequent to the estimates submitted, that there are a few courts which can not now be furnished with the reports. The $715 item following is for advance sheets of the Federal Reporter.

As to the advance sheets, while it is true that the law does not compel the distribution of the advance sheets, the department in contracting for the books secured a rate of $2 a volume, and if it is desired to have the advance sheets they can be obtained at 50 cents a year additional, making $2.50, in place of $3.50, the commercial rate.

It is for the Congress to say whether or not they will furnish to the courts these advance sheets, but as the bound volumes are furnished under the $2 rate the advance sheets will not be furnished without the additional charge. That applies to the first two paragraphs.

As to the next paragraph, from line 15 to 18, that is to buy the books provided for.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator passes from the subject of advance sheets——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator bear in mind the statement which was made here on Saturday by various Senators, my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia], I recollect, among others, that the invariable rule was where the purchaser subscribed to the bound volumes that the advance sheets were furnished without cost?

Mr. WARREN. That is in cases where the regular price is paid. It was also stated by Senators, among others, I think, by the Senator from Washington and the Senator from South Dakota, that there is a difference in the subscription price, whether only the bound volumes themselves are supplied or whether the bound volumes and the advance sheets are furnished.

Now, in the Government's contract—or I think it is a provision in the law—it is provided that the Government shall pay $2 a volume for the books, and it is the pleasure of the company to say whether it will furnish these loose sheets or not, because the law does not compel the publishers to supply them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there should be no question as to the propriety of furnishing the advance sheets. They enable the courts to keep strictly apace with the decisions of the courts and not be compelled to wait until the publication of the volumes. Every practicing lawyer knows that the advance sheets are indispensable; and whether they are to be paid for or not, the question of not having them should be eliminated at once.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming or the Senator from Idaho, whichever may be able to reply or will kindly do so, does not the same rule apply to the United States that applies to private individual practitioners of the law—that he who subscribes for the regular edition of the West Reporter system——

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. MYERS (continuing). Is furnished with the advance sheets free of any additional charge?

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems not. It seems that the Government makes a contract by which it secures these volumes at a reduced price, and that price does not include the advance sheets.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me the statement of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] before the Judiciary Committee was that in consideration of the fact of having so many copies taken by the Government the publishing company would reduce the price to the Government from $3.50 a volume to $2. That was one of the moving considerations which caused the adoption of the proposition. I supposed that would naturally include the advance sheets. I think the Senator from Minnesota will recollect that the price was to be $2 a volume instead of $3.50, for the reasons I have stated, and that would naturally include the advance sheets. Now, instead of sending the advance sheets, they come here and ask us to appropriate money for the advance sheets.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that when the Government, through the Department of Justice, makes a contract by which it secures these books for a little over half the regular subscription price the advance sheets are included. The commercial rate for these volumes is $3.50 a volume, and when the Government gets them at $2 per volume I do not see how the Government can insist upon the publishing company giving them something to boot, and something which is not contracted for.

If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I should like to say just a word more as to the next paragraphs, because they refer to the same subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. As to the next five paragraphs we find, first, that while about 150 courts have been provided for as to back numbers about 160 courts yet remain totally unprovided for, and, second, it has been learned that a few of the courts have not the proper buildings and custodians to properly care for the books. Therefore it is proposed to reduce this appropriation from $74,000 to $62,000, and I shall offer to thus amend the paragraph, and following that, as to the Federal Reporter, it has been found that it can, for the same reason, be reduced from $3,400 to $2,900, and that the loose sheets which were listed at $850 can be reduced to a quarter of the sum last before mentioned. Those five paragraphs, as I said before, all apply to the Federal Reporter.

Now, on the next page the purpose of the committee is to move to strike out $38,000 unless the Senate shall advise otherwise. This paragraph proposes to furnish the Federal Reporter to district attorneys, and I firmly believe they ought to be so furnished, but the committee has upon reflection decided otherwise and directed me to move to strike out the provision.

My own opinion is that no one needs these books more than the district attorneys need them, and I wish they might be furnished, but that is a matter for the Senate to decide.

Now, as to the Supreme Court Reports, that is a different matter. They are to be distributed in 197 different places.

I thank the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think we can at least arrive at a definite knowledge and doubtless at a conclusion. If the inducement of subscribing for a very large number of sets of the Federal Reports is sufficient, then, of course, there should be no extra pay for advance sheets. The advance sheets are not expensive, and they have always been furnished without charge to attorneys who subscribe to the sets. That, however, is a matter of contract.

I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the ambiguity of the language in describing the subscription. It says:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter—

Now, there is no such thing as the Federal Reporter. There is a Federal Reporter system, and it includes the Federal Reporter, the C. C. A.—the Circuit Court of Appeals—Reports, and the Supreme Court Reports. Now, those are all published by the Federal Reporter system. So that that language is ambiguous, and the ambiguity of it is emphasized when you apply it to an expression in this bill. It says:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for additional volumes of continuations for the fiscal year commencing—

"Additional volumes" there would mean additional volumes of the Federal Reporter, of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and of the Supreme Court Reports. There are three publications, all published by the Reporter system.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FALL. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that on the eighth line, and following to line 11, there is a provision "to pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for the estimated continuations for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912," while the paragraph which he read, commencing in line 19, reads:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for additional volumes of continuations for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912.

Are those additional to the estimates made?

Mr. HEYBURN. "Volumes of continuations" of what? Of the Federal Reporter, of the Circuit Court of Appeals or of the United States Supreme Court reports?

Mr. FALL. That is what I am asking the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was criticising the language as being so indefinite as not to express with any certainty the intention of the act.

Mr. FALL. I was calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that, apparently, there is an absolute conflict or a double appropriation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I can explain that matter if the Senator will yield to me. I can explain how it comes about.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me make this statement, and the Senator will then have the entire statement before his mind.

Take the other item of $74,000, which, by the way, the chairman says will be reduced to $62,000. I read the language of the paragraph:

To pay for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

That is, $74,000 to pay for additional books. That includes the Federal Reporter, the Circuit Court of Appeals and the United States Supreme Court reports.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. They furnish them under it.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no. That is a different law. I call the Senator's attention to it——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear definitely the views of the Senator in regard to that, because I am speaking from the text.

Mr. NELSON. I will explain that in my own time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I will proceed, if that is the purpose of the Senator.

Mr. President, that language is too indefinite upon which to base an appropriation of $74,000. All attorneys know about the relative cost of the Federal Reporter, the Circuit Court of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court Reports. The Federal Reporter contains every decision that is in the Circuit Court of Appeals. I want that statement to rest in the minds of Senators. The Circuit Court of Appeals is a duplicate of a portion of the Federal Reporter. Now, why they ever separated them I never have been able to understand, except it was to enable them to sell more books. I have both sets, and I suppose every other attorney in this body knows about those reports. For some reason, in order to dignify the Circuit Court of Appeals Reports, they publish them in the Federal Reporter and again publish them separately, and you will find a double citation in the digest or wherever they are referred to. There never was any occasion to do so, except to make a larger sale for the books—duplicate them.

I am endeavoring to contribute something to the straightening out of this rather mixed situation. It is not material what are the estimates from the Department of Justice, because we are just as familiar with it as the Department of Justice can ever be. We know what books are published and what they cost.

Now, the words "pay for additional books authorized" is too indefinite. The term should be amended.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that is the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I understand.

"Authorized to be furnished." The question is, What is "authorized to be furnished"? I had the judiciary act here, but it has escaped me. It may or may not be that the Attorney General could as readily have arranged for the advance sheets to accompany the Government's subscription as they do the individual's subscription. I have never known it to be difficult for a subscriber to obtain the advance sheets when he subscribed for the bound volumes. The advance sheets are not supposed to be bound. To make them permanently useful, they would have to be indexed and bound and a great deal of work done upon them. That covers the question of the bound volumes and the advance sheets.

A word now as to the Supreme Court Reports:

To pay for complete sets—

I read, commencing in line 4, on page 131:

To pay for complete sets and additional volumes, as issued, of the Supreme Court Reports and digests thereof--

Now, that has nothing to do with the Federal Reporter system. That is independent—authorized to be furnished under sections 227 and 228.

So that we do not want to confuse that with the Supreme Court Reporter.

I think we had better take time to straighten this out. I had my copy of the judiciary act marked.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose the Senator from Idaho remembers that as to the Supreme Court Reports, they were formerly handled under the Interior Department, and they have now been transferred to the Department of Justice.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I have what I want marked in my copy, but I have been handed a strange copy of the act. Let us get this into the RECORD, so that it will always be available in connection with the consideration of this subject.

The Attorney General shall distribute copies of the Supreme Court Reports as follows:

Then follows the designation of the parties to whom the reports are to be distributed.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that the Senator from Idaho have the list published in the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. All of it?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well. I will ask that sections 227, 228, and 229 be published in the RECORD without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The sections referred to are as follows:

SEC. 227. The Attorney General shall distribute copies of the Supreme Court Reports as follows: To the President, the justices of the Supreme Court, the judges of the Commerce Court, the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals, the judges of the circuit courts of appeals, the judges of the district courts, the judges of the Court of Claims, the judges of the Court of Appeals and of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the judges of the several Territorial courts, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Solicitor General, the Assistant to the Attorney General, each Assistant Attorney General, each United States district attorney, each Assistant Secretary of each executive department, the Assistant Postmasters General, the Secretary of the Senate for the use of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the House of Representatives, the governors of the Territories, the Solicitor for the Department of State, the Treasurer of the United States, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Register of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Director of the Mint, each of the six auditors in the Treasury Department, the Judge Advocate General, War Department; the Paymaster General, War Department; the Judge Advocate General, Navy Department; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Education, the Commissioner of Labor, the Commissioner of Navigation, the Commissioner of Corporations, the Commissioner General of Immigration, the Chief of the Bureau of Manufactures, the Director of the Geological Survey, the Director of the Census, the Forester, Department of Agriculture; the purchasing agent, Post Office Department; the Interstate Commerce Commission, the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, the attorney for the District of Columbia, the Naval Academy at Annapolis, the Military Academy at West Point, and the heads of such other executive offices as may be provided by law, of equal grade with any of said offices, each 1 copy; to the law library of the Supreme Court, 25 copies; to the law library of the Department of the Interior, 2 copies; to the law library of the Department of Justice, 2 copies; to the Secretary of the Senate for the use of the committees of the Senate, 25 copies; to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the committees of the House, 30 copies; to the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, as custodian of the public property used by the court, for the use of the justices thereof in the conference room, robing room, and court room, 3 copies; to the Secretary of War for the use of the proper courts and officers of the Philippine Islands and for the headquarters of military departments in the United States, 12 copies; and to each of the places where district courts of the United States are now holden, including Hawaii and Porto Rico, 1 copy. He shall also distribute one complete set of said reports and one set of the digests thereof to such executive officers as are entitled to receive said reports under this section and have not already received them, to each United States judge and to each United States district attorney who has not received a set, to each of the places where district courts are now held to which said reports have not been distributed, and to each of the places at which a district court may hereafter be held, the edition of said reports and digests to be selected by the judge or officer receiving them. No distribution of reports and digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of said courts (except the Supreme Court) shall in all cases keep said reports and digest for the use of the courts and of the officers thereof. Such reports and digest shall remain the property of the United States, and shall be preserved by the officers above named and by them turned over to their successors in office.

SEC. 228. The publishers of the decisions of the Supreme Court shall deliver to the Attorney General, in addition to the 300 copies delivered by the Reporter, such number of copies of each report heretofore published as the Attorney General may require, for which he shall pay not more than $2 per volume, and such number of copies of each report hereafter published as he may require, for which he shall pay not more than $1.75 per volume. The Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the current volumes of such reports and also for the additional sets of reports and digests required for distribution under the section last preceding.

SEC. 229. The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publications containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued, and distribute a copy of each such reports and digests to each place where a circuit court of appeals or a district court is now or may hereafter regularly be held, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Court of Customs Appeals, the Commerce Court, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Interstate Commerce Commission; and to the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than three sets each. Whenever any such court room, office, or officer shall have a partial or complete set of any such reports or digests already purchased or owned by the United States, the Attorney General shall distribute to such court room, office, or officer only sufficient volumes to make a complete set thereof. No distribution of reports or digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of the courts (except the Supreme Court) to which the reports and digests are distributed under this section shall keep such reports and digests for the use of the courts and the officers thereof. All reports and digests distributed under the provisions of this section shall be and remain the property of the United States and before distribution shall be plainly marked on their covers with the words "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving them to their successors in office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, on page 131, the provision relates not to the Reporter system, but to the Supreme Court reports, which are printed under an entirely different provision of law.

The paragraph on page 130, which is not numbered, carrying an appropriation of $74,000, refers entirely to the Federal Reporter system, and has no application whatever to the general provision for the publishing of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. My recollection, as a practicing lawyer—and I have no doubt the Senator has the same recollection—is that all of these courts have been furnished with the Supreme Court reports. They all have them now. Is not that true?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true, so far as concerns the courts that were established when the provision was made; but there have been new districts established, and some additions in the way of necessities, in regard to——

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me for the additional courts that we have established $96,000 is a very large amount of money. We have not established more than a dozen new courts.

Mr. WARREN. Are there not additional volumes coming out?

Mr. OVERMAN. The additional volumes cost a dollar and a half apiece, and for 315 courts the cost would be about $500. Here is $96,000, when we all know that we have these sets now, except for the additional courts. The Senator says the publishers get out two volumes a year. With 315 courts, at a dollar and a half a volume, the cost would be $500. Here is $96,000 for that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us get the point down to a satisfactory basis. In the first place, we have diminished the number of courts, and the United States district courts now are the sole successors of the district and circuit courts. Those courts are all provided with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. They are not all provided with the decisions of the United States district and circuit courts.

There is necessity, inasmuch as we have made the district judges the successors to the circuit judges, to supply those courts, or many of them, with the Federal Reporter. That is obvious. They should have available all of the law of the courts to which they succeeded.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. However, I am not yet through. But I will be glad of any interruption.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, in reply to the Senator from North Carolina, I will call his attention to the estimate. It may throw some light on the question he asked. The estimate here, under the head "Supreme Court Reports," is as follows:

To pay for complete sets of additional volumes, as issued, of the Supreme Court Reports and digests thereof, authorized to be furnished under sections 227 and 228 of the "act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," to be immediately available and to remain available until expended (act Mar. 3, 1911, vol. 36, pp. 1154, 1155, secs. 227, 228), $96,309.50.

197 complete sets of 221 volumes each, at $2 per volume, additional to the distribution made by the Interior Department, will be required	$87,074.00
197 additional copies of each of volumes 222 to 227, inclusive, at $1.75 per volume, and 15 copies of volume 56 of the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition, at $5 per volume, in addition to the distribution made by the Interior Department	2,143.50
197 sets of the digest, at $36 per set	7,092.00
Total	96,309.50

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether there is any provision that Congress shall furnish the lawyers' edition of the Supreme Court Reports. I know of no law which provides that, instead of sending out those volumes, they shall send out what is called the lawyers' edition, gotten up by the West Publishing Co.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is gotten up by the Cooperative.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Cooperative.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am asking for information.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to answer just one question? The Supreme Court Reports referred to in the bill, and which the Senator referred to, are not published by the West Publishing Co.; they are published by Banks Bros., New York.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that what is known as the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition has Rose's notes.

Mr. NELSON. That is published in New York—not by the West Publishing Co.

Mr. OVERMAN. Wherever it is published, I do not think that Congress has any business to send out those books. Where is the general law which provides for sending out that Lawyers' Cooperative Edition?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator I suppose he refers to sections 227 and 228 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

Mr. OVERMAN. But that provides for only the Supreme Court Reports. I want to know if there is any law under which the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition is sent out in addition to the Supreme Court Reports. As we all know, the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition contains nothing but the Supreme Court decisions, with Rose's notes published with it.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Idaho will yield to me, I will read the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I read from volume 36, Statutes at Large, page 1419. It is a part of the sundry civil appropriation act passed March 4, 1911. The paragraph reads as follows:

Supreme Court Reports: To pay the publishers of the Decisions of the Supreme Court for 270 copies of volumes 224 to 227, inclusive, official edition, at $2 per volume—

Now, listen to this language—and for 15 copies of volume 55 of the Decisions of the Supreme Court, Lawyers' Cooperative Publishing Co., at $5 per volume, $2,235.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator excuse me? That is a provision in the sundry civil appropriation act. That has been going on from time to time in the sundry civil appropriation bills. That act is no longer the law of the land. What I complain of is that there is no general law which provides for this distribution. Of course, a good many things are slipped into the sundry civil appropriation bill. What the Senator reads from is nothing but a clause in an appropriation bill which goes out on the 1st of July. Is there any general law for publishing these volumes? I do not think Congress has any business to duplicate these Supreme Court decisions because, forsooth, some lawyers want a few notes. Let them look at the decisions themselves.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the law under which the appropriation referred to by the Senator from Minnesota was enacted is not the present law. The present law went into effect January 1, 1912, and it was enacted March 3, 1911. The Senator was reading from the statutes a provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill under the law that existed prior to the adoption of the present law. So it has no application. We were very careful and spent a great deal of time enumerating these publications. I suppose it took a week to determine in committee what law publications should be included in this distribution. There was considerable difference of opinion among the members of the committee. The present law is the result of their conclusions as to the enactment of a law, and it ought to be strictly complied with.

There is no provision in existing law for furnishing Coöp., as it is familiarly termed among lawyers, or any other publication than the official publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Reporter system, which includes it, is not included within the books to be furnished under the existing law. You will find the decisions of the Supreme Court referring frequently to the decisions in the Reporter system—that is to say, the decisions of the Supreme Court sent out by the Federal Reporter system—but that no longer exists. It was intended by the committee to eliminate those extra publications; and if we disregard that intention, notwithstanding it is expressed in the law, you will have simply brushed aside the very painstaking law which was enacted here for the purpose of covering this question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Idaho has before him sections 227 and 228 of the civil code. Will he please read them?

Mr. HEYBURN. They have just gone into the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to know what they are.

Mr. HEYBURN. If Senators will follow the reading, I will be very glad to read them.

Mr. CUMMINS. What section is it the Senator is about to read?

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 227.

Mr. CUMMINS. And section 228.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read them in the order:

SEC. 227. The Attorney General shall distribute copies of the Supreme Court Reports as follows—

That is the official term, the "Supreme Court Reports"—

To the President, the Justices of the Supreme Court, the judges of the Commerce Court, the judges of the Court of Customs Appeals, the judges of the circuit courts of appeals, the judges of the district courts, the judges of the Court of Claims, the judges of the Court of Appeals and of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the judges of the several Territorial courts, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Solicitor General, the Assistant to the Attorney General, each Assistant Attorney General, each United States district attorney, each Assistant Secretary of each executive department, the Assistant Postmasters General, the Secretary of the Senate for the use of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the House of Representatives, the governors of the Territories, the Solicitor for the Department of State, the Treasurer of the United States, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Register of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Director of the Mint, each of the six auditors in the Treasury Department, the Judge Advocate General War Department, the Paymaster General War Department, the Judge Advocate General Navy Department, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Pensions, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Education, the Commissioner of Labor, the Commissioner of Navigation, the Commissioner of Corporations, the Commissioner General of Immigration, the Chief of the Bureau of Manufactures, the Director of the Geological Survey, the Director of the Census, the Forester Department of Agriculture, the Purchasing Agent Post Office Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, the attorney for the District of Columbia, the Naval Academy at Annapolis, the Military Academy at West Point, and the heads of such other executive offices as may be provided by law of equal grade with any of said offices, each one copy.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Idaho remember how many sets are there provided for?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the report that accompanied this enactment, in which this matter is considered in detail. I have it not at hand. I did not anticipate any necessity for it. But each of the parties I have named gets one copy.

Mr. CUMMINS. One copy of each volume?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does that contemplate that each shall have a complete set of the reports?

Mr. HEYBURN. That comes under a different provision. That is for the annual distribution.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question? Does it provide that the district attorneys shall get a copy?

Mr. HEYBURN. I was carrying that in my mind to recur to.

Mr. OVERMAN. The district attorneys are not provided for.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will come back to that. I was carrying that in mind while reading, and I will recur to it.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the very same section he is reading, further down——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to answer this question, now that I have it before me?

Each United States district attorney—

That is in section 227——

Mr. NELSON. What I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to is that this very section, down in the middle, on page 79, provides for the distribution of back numbers.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will come to that. I am reading down to it. The Senator from Iowa asked for the reading of it, and I was proceeding.

The Naval Academy at Annapolis, the Military Academy at West Point, and the heads of such other executive offices as may be provided by law, of equal grade with any of said offices, each one copy.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that at page 116 of the bill as printed for the use of the committee, it is shown by an extract from the House hearings that the Attorney General did not believe that the district attorneys should be furnished with the Federal Reporter; that is to say, that there was no existing law providing that the Federal Reporter——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that we are not yet dealing with the Federal Reporter. I am now, at the request of the Senator from Iowa, considering the distribution of the United States Supreme Court Reports. I will come to the Federal Reporter in a little while.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Attorney General recommends that section 229 of the code be amended so that the district attorneys shall be furnished with the Federal Reporter, and this bill, over my objection as a member of the subcommittee, carries an appropriation of $38,000 to buy back numbers of the Federal Reporter for the district attorneys of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will have something to say about that when we come to that section, if the Senator will pardon me for not taking it up now. I want to proceed with the consideration of this matter in order. We have already made some headway and thrown some light on this section 227 by reading it carefully. It has been read only in a fragmentary way before.

Now, let us proceed:

To the law library of the Supreme Court, 25 copies; to the law library of the Department of the Interior, 2 copies; to the law library of the Department of Justice, 2 copies; to the Secretary of the Senate for the use of the committees of the Senate, 25 copies; to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the committees of the House, 30 copies; to the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, as custodian of the public property used by the court, for the use of the justices thereof in the conference room, robing room, and court room, 3 copies.

A copy for each room.

To the Secretary of War, for the use of the proper courts and officers of the Philippine Islands and for the headquarters of military departments in the United States, 12 copies.

That is one copy for each of those officers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we are unable to hear the Senator in this part of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Complaint is made that the Senator is not heard on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. HEYBURN (reading)—

And to each of the places where district courts of the United States are now holden, including Hawaii and Porto Rico, one copy.

That is, to the place where they are holden.

He shall also distribute one complete set of said reports—

That is confined to the United States Supreme Court Reports—and one set of the digests thereof to such executive officers as are entitled to receive said reports—

That is, the digest goes with the reports—

under this section, and have not already received them, to each United States judge and to each United States district attorney who has not received a set, to each of the places where district courts are now held, to which said reports have not been distributed, and to each of the places at which a district court may hereafter be held, the edition of said reports and digests to be selected by the judge or officer receiving them.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] called attention to the distribution of volumes of the cooperative edition of the Supreme Court Reports to some places. I notice, commencing on line 11, page 131, provision is made for 15 copies of volume 56 of the lawyers' cooperative edition in addition to the distribution made by the Interior Department. I should like to ask the Senator if he finds in the law any provision by which the Interior Department distributes the Supreme Court Reports?

Mr. HEYBURN. They heretofore did distribute them, but under the new system they no longer distribute them.

Mr. FALL. Apparently they will distribute them if we adopt this wording.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it behooves us to be careful that we do not provide for a general distribution of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I think it does provide for it. The Senator from Wyoming read from the estimates that so many copies are provided for, and provision is made for the lawyers' cooperative edition, to which I objected. In addition to that, the Senator from New Mexico calls my attention to the fact that the House itself has provided for another 15 copies, which is carried forward from the old sundry civil appropriation bill. So there was no reason for the distribution of the cooperative edition in this language from lines 4 to 10.

Mr. HEYBURN. If there is any proposed legislation recognizing the right or duty on the part of the Interior Department to distribute them, then it was through inadvertence, because it was the intention of the framers of the judiciary code to substitute the Department of Justice entirely and completely for the Interior Department. In distributing the public laws of the country it was thought more appropriate that they should be distributed by the Department of Justice than by the Department of the Interior. The provision with reference to the Department of the Interior distributing them is very old legislation, and probably it had not proper consideration at the time.

But at the time we were enacting the judiciary code everything was brought up for first consideration regardless of existing conditions. It was intended to substitute entirely and completely the Department of Justice for the Secretary of the Interior, and it certainly would recommend itself to Senators as a better method, inasmuch as the Department of Justice deals peculiarly with the subject and has knowledge that the Secretary of the Interior could not have at first hand.

I will finish reading a few lines that remain in this section:

No distribution of reports and digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed.

In many places the courts of the United States are being held in the State buildings, because they are not yet provided with Government buildings. We rent quarters for them. In every place in our State, except one, the United States court sits in rented quarters. I had a statement as to the number of places in each State. It is sufficient to say that in a very large number of places the United States courts are held in rented buildings. Now, there is a responsible designated custodian and officer of the United States to have the possession of these books.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho has made the law perfectly plain, so that we all understand it. I understood the Senator from Wyoming to state from the estimates from the Department of Justice that we were about to distribute 200 complete sets or something like that number——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One hundred and ninety-seven.

Mr. CUMMINS. That we were about to distribute 197 complete sets of the Supreme Court Reports. Now, if they are to be distributed at all, they must be distributed to clerks in the various departments, to the heads of bureaus, or something of that sort. I should like to know just who are to receive these 197 complete sets of the Supreme Court Reports under this appropriation, if the Senator from Idaho has looked into that sufficiently to answer the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have a list of all those who receive them. The Attorney General designates them in his report, and I suppose assigns the duty of ascertaining just who is entitled to them to some of the heads of departments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the courts all have them, the district attorneys all have them, the Cabinet officers all have them, and the committees all have them—that is, the committees that are authorized there—but I should like if the Senator from Idaho would make it perfectly clear who are to get this eighty-seven thousands dollars' worth of Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to finish some six or seven lines that I have here. Then I will have read the entire section:

> No distribution of reports or digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of the courts (except the Supreme Court) to which the reports and digests are distributed under this section shall keep such reports and digests for the use of the courts and the officers thereof. All reports and digests distributed under the provisions of this section shall be and remain the property of the United States and, before distribution, shall be plainly marked on their covers with the words "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving them to their successors in office.

I had it in mind, and urged it rather strongly at the time we were framing this section, that the reports that were sent to the United States district courts should be kept in a room where they would be accessible to the judge and to the United States attorney and to any other officer of the court having occasion to refer to them. It seemed to me at that time that that would be a sufficient accommodation of the court; in other words, that they should not be locked up within the judge's chamber so that the United States attorney would be obliged to knock on the door to ascertain whether or not he might be admitted for the purpose of having access to these reports, but that a room should be provided in which all the reports furnished to the court would be kept and be accessible to the judge or judges and the United States attorney, and where they could retire to examine them. At that time we had in many districts two judges or three and in one we had four. We had the United States circuit judges and we had the United States district judges. All of them could readily be accommodated by having access to rooms in which the reports were kept and they could examine them, without excluding at the time of their examination any other officer of the court; but it was thought by the committee wise to be generous in this matter and to provide for a larger distribution of them. The appropriation bill, however, should not go beyond that. There should be an estimate, and doubtless is, from the Attorney General enumerating the persons to whom under the law and under this section the Supreme Court Reports of the United States should be distributed.

Bear in mind again that this does not include at all the Federal reports, outside of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, but here is an ambiguity of language that must be taken into consideration and evidently had been taken into consideration by the Attorney General. In the latter part of section 227 it is provided:

> And to each of the places at which the district court may hereafter be held, the edition of said reports and digests to be selected by the judge or officer receiving them.

That was to give the judge the option of having either the cooperative or the regular edition. There are judges in certain districts who prefer to use the cooperative edition. In that case, upon a request from that judge, he has them, not in addition to the regular publication of the United States Supreme Court Reports, but in lieu of them. It does not contemplate a double distribution of one set of cooperative reports of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, with the digest, and, in addition to that, a copy of what we know as the regular edition of the Supreme Court Reports. If this bill contemplates the purchase of both for any district, then it goes beyond the provisions of this law.

This is a large item, but with careful consideration there is no reason why there should be any embarrassment in complying with its provisions or in distributing these reports. It so happens that they are expensive and amount to a large sum of money in the aggregate. So much for the Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the hearings before the House committee in explanation of these Supreme Court Reports. Mr. Field makes the following statement:

> Section 227 of the judicial code provides for furnishing Supreme Court Reports to 782 officers or places, which is 197 sets more than the old law provided for; and this estimate, given in the note there, of $87,074 is the cost of these 197 additional sets.

Then Mr. Field also says that—

> The additional places are made up of 10 officials in Washington, such as the assistant secretaries of the departments, etc., 8 United States judges, 86 United States attorneys, and 81 places of holding United States courts.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many United States attorneys?

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty-six United States attorneys and 81 places of holding United States courts.

Those numbers added together make 197 complete sets. The old law only provided for 782 offices or places.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I could not hear where the Senator says those volumes are sent. I heard the first part of his statement, but he turned his face in the other direction and I could not catch what he then said.

Mr. SMOOT. I will repeat it:

> The additional places are made up of 10 officials in Washington, such as the assistant secretaries of departments, etc., 8 United States judges, 86 United States attorneys, and 81 places of holding United States courts.

Making 197 sets more than section 227 of the old law provided for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator passes I wish to ask, Does Mr. Field show 81 additional places where United States courts are held beyond the number prior to the adoption of that act? I do not believe that is possible.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not additional places—81 places of holding United States courts; and section 227 of the Judicial Code only provided for 782 offices or places. Those 81 places were not provided for in the number of 782, and that leaves a deficiency of 197 sets more than the old law provides for.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the distribution under the old law is not worthy of or does not call for any serious consideration in connection with this proposed legislation. This is the first time that Congress has been called upon to make this distribution under existing law, and the questions suggested by the Senator from Utah were all considered by the committee in providing for the rule of distribution for the first time invoked in Congress, so that while they are interesting historically they have nothing whatever to do with the interpretation of the existing law, which has not heretofore been interpreted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator, I desire to say this, that unless the 197 additional sets are provided in this appropriation bill or in some other bill, then there will be 8 United States judges, 86 United States attorneys, 81 places of holding United States court, and 10 officers in Washington who will not have the Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is just the question that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws considered, and they solved it. It is solved in section 226 and the sections following that. They realized just the condition the Senator pictures, and in order to meet that condition they provided for an adequate distribution of these reports.

Mr. SMOOT. They did not provide the means for purchasing the additional reports, however.

Mr. HEYBURN. They provided for them to be furnished, and the question of providing the money to pay for them is a question important in itself, but not a controlling question in determining who shall receive them.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, this is an appropriation bill to provide money to pay for those 197 sets.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that; this appropriation is merely to carry out existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the existing law provides for the persons who shall receive these books. We are undertaking to appropriate the money, but we are drifting back into a consideration of a law that no longer has any existence or any controlling influence whatever. All we want to do is to take up section 227, and on the statement of the number of sets or volumes required to be furnished under it and the price to be paid for them, authorize their purchase. That is the whole story.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator if he can find any law for the distribution by the Attorney General of the Federal Reporter to United States district attorneys for which it is sought here to make an appropriation of $38,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not as yet taken up the question of the Federal Reporter, but I am about to do so. I wanted to dispose of as a separate proposition the question of the Supreme Court Reports, and then, when that was finished, I wanted to take up the Federal Reporter which is provided for in an entirely different section of the statute.

Mr. FALL. I understood the Senator to refer also in his remarks to section 229.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I have not done so yet.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Utah has just read the statement of the representative of the Department of Justice before the committee. He accounts for these sets of reports by saying, among other things, that 10 of them are needed in Washington. I may pause there to say I can not understand why the Government furnishes assistant secretaries and heads of bureaus with Supreme Court Reports and does not furnish Senators with sets of Supreme Court Reports. I think if anybody needs them the Senate of the United States needs them, although I do not mean to disparage the law learning of our body.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, however——

Mr. CUMMINS. Eighty-one of these sets are for supplying places in which United States courts are held. Now, is it possible that we furnish a set of reports to the judge and then also furnish a set of reports to the place in which he is doing his work? If we give him a set of reports we certainly ought not also to put in his court or court room another set of reports. I do not understand that provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. As a matter of fact, we do not do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, we are going to send out 81 sets. I assume that every judge in the country has a set.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, where he sits in chambers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; and now we are going to furnish another set to his court room.

Mr. HEYBURN. For the officers of the court.

Mr. CUMMINS. What other officers are there except the district attorney? And the district attorney is also provided with a set. It seems to me we are becoming most extravagant in supplying these reports.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have yielded to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wanted to know whether we were to furnish a set of reports not only to the place at which the court is held, but also to the judge who holds the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would say that the judge who holds the court sits at chambers at places other than where the court is held. He may sit at chambers in any place—at his home, for instance. It is intended to provide him with convenient access to the Supreme Court Reports wherever he may be required or find it convenient to sit for the purpose of hearing matters. Whether it is wise or not, it is the law. We had a very great deal of discussion in regard to this subject, and there was a variety of opinion expressed as to who should receive the reports and where they should receive them, but this was the ultimate conclusion.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. While it is the law, we need not make the appropriation for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. We ought to make appropriations to carry out existing law; if we do not, we are then open to the charge of disregarding existing law.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we decline to make the appropriation, it is, in effect, a repeal of the law, and we have a right to repeal the law. I think the Senate ought to pass upon that question as to whether or not we are going to furnish——

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to the Senate passing upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. As to whether or not we are going to furnish the court rooms with decisions and going to furnish the judge himself with decisions and going to furnish officers of the courts, district attorneys, and others with the decisions. The whole amount of this appropriation is over $200,000, and I think we ought to strike it all out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the 81 places may be known by Senators—I will not take the time to read them, but I ask that they be put in the RECORD as a part of my statement. The hearings give the exact places where they go and to whom, and I believe that it would be a good thing to put the facts in the RECORD. I will ask that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say, replying to the Senator from Iowa in regard to Supreme Court Reports being furnished to Senators, that there is a provision that a certain number shall come to the Senate and a certain number to the House of Representatives. Let me say further that it is my intention to offer certain amendments, and I shall state them now, so that they may be understood in the debate.

First, I propose to reduce the appropriatior in line 18, page 130, from $74,000 to $62,000; second, on the same page, line 22, I shall propose to reduce the appropriation from $3,400 to $2,900; third, on line 25, to reduce $850 to $725; fourth, I propose to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 131; and, fifth, to strike out the provision of the House bill in lines 11, 12, and 13, providing for 15 copies of volume 56 of the lawyers' cooperative edition in addition to the distribution made by the Interior Department.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, while we are on the subject of Supreme Court Reports I want to make a brief statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think to avoid confusion we should finish up the Supreme Court Reports before taking up the Federal Reports, and I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the law in regard to the Supreme Court Reports before the judicial code was enacted. By section 681 of the Revised Statutes the reporter of the Supreme Court was required to furnish 300 copies of each set of the decisions—of the Supreme Court Reports—and they were to be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior in connection with section 386 of the Revised Statutes, which provided:

SEC. 386. The Department of Justice shall be charged with the distribution to the various judges and courts of the statutes, reports, and other judicial documents provided by law.

Section 683 prescribed where these 300 copies were to be distributed. That was the total amount of the distribution until the act of February 12, 1889 (25 Stats., 661). That statute amended the old statute by providing for the distribution of 76 copies in addition to the 300, and repealed that part of the law requiring the Supreme Court judges to distribute them to the courts, and so forth. So before the code was enacted the total number of Supreme Court Reports distributed annually was 376 volumes, and they were distributed through the Secretary of the Interior under this act.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is repealed by section 297 of the judiciary act.

Mr. NELSON. The judicial code more than doubled that amount of distribution. It raised it from 376 volumes, distributed through the Secretary of the Interior, to between seven and eight hundred volumes, distributed through the Department of Justice in the manner indicated by the section the Senator has just read.

I might say, further, that these Supreme Court reports are not published by the West Publishing Co. They are published by Banks Bros., of New York. These other paragraphs relating to the Federal Reporter are entirely distinct from that matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are not published by the United States. None of them is published by the United States.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. The United States secures them by contract with the publishers. That applies to what is called the regular edition as well as to these other editions.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator has no objection, I should like now to say a few words about the Federal Reporter.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have that go over until we reach that section, to avoid confusion.

Mr. NELSON. They are in the same paragraph.

Mr. HEYBURN. While this takes considerable time, it is time that must be devoted to the determination of this question. There seems to be such a diversity of opinion in regard to it that we must get it straight before we act upon it.

Now I have about finished with the Supreme Court Reports—that is, the reports of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. They are to be furnished either in the Banks edition or in the cooperative edition, or in any edition that any judge may request. That provision was put in to settle a controversy that waged so long before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws that we grew so tired of it that we were compelled to make some concession in favor of what is called the irregular publication of the reports of the United States Supreme Court.

There are many lawyers and some judges that seem to prefer what is known as the "irregular edition" of the Cooperative Publishing Co. to the Banks edition; so we made the concession of allowing the judge of the court to elect which edition he should receive. But, having made that election, he can not change it. He can not start in and take the Cooperative edition for one year or three years or five years, and then switch off and discontinue that and take the Banks edition. That would not be practicable. But that provision was intended to apply to where courts are initiated, and are laying the foundation of their law library. The judges, being appointed for life, and presumably of long term, say: "We prefer, during our tenure of office, to have for reference in our chambers or in our courts the cooperative edition or the Banks edition." There is still another one; there are three of them altogether. But the cooperative edition and what we know as the regular edition are generally selected.

As I have said, it was not intended that they should be duplicated. This phrase in section 227, in the tenth line from the end of the section, was not intended to enlarge the distribution, but only to give the right of electing between them.

The committee doubtless have the enumeration of the places where the courts are held. If they have not, it is in this statute. The judiciary act prescribes where the courts are to be held, and they can not be held anywhere else than at the places provided by law. They would have no jurisdiction anywhere else. So there is no difficulty in determining the number of places at which the courts shall be held.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The House hearings have all these places in them. I am just looking at what is said here about North Carolina—my own State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me suggest to the Senator that it is not necessary to go to the hearings for that. It is in the law itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that, but in the House hearings these places are set out, and some say they want the reports while others say they do not want them at all. In North Carolina, in the western district, a full set was furnished to Asheville while Charlotte did not want any. In Greensboro there was a full set furnished, and in Salisbury they did not want any; and so on. In Elizabeth City and Raleigh there were full sets furnished, but these other places did not need them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, they will not be sent to them if they do not want them, and that part of the appropriation will not be expended.

Mr. OVERMAN. The law requires them to be sent to them, and here they say they do not need them in these places.

Mr. HEYBURN. If one of these judges said he did not want the reports, my sympathy would be with the Attorney General if he sent them to him, anyway, so that he might have no excuse for not knowing the law. The idea of a man sitting in judgment over a United States court saying he did not want to have the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. It reminds me of—well, I was going to refer to an incident, but I will not do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator recognizes, I think, that the judges in North Carolina will compare favorably with the judges in any other State.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not casting aspersions on the judges of any State.

Mr. OVERMAN. The judge has a set in his own chambers, and he has a set in the main district where he sits, and he says that at these other places where he holds court he does not need them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then he is not included in the provision we are talking about, because it only provides for furnishing them where they have not them already.

Mr. OVERMAN. But do they have them at these places? I do not know whether the judges made these memoranda or not, but they say they do not need them at these places.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is because they have them already, I suppose.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, the districts are being divided up, and the district judge in many instances is not in the division of the district for more than a week. He goes over and holds court there for a week and then goes back again to his principal office. There is no necessity whatever for buying a complete set of reports to put at a court room where the judge sits only one week. He can easily procure the volumes from members of the bar if he wishes to use them.

It seems to me that if we furnish a complete set to the judge at his principal office it is unnecessary, where he practically rides the circuit in his district, to place a set at every court, at some of which he does not remain a week twice a year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am quite familiar with that conditions of affairs. It is quite usual for judges sitting away from the principal seat of justice to reserve their decisions on questions presented to them until they return to their principal place of holding court. That is quite usual all over the United States. I realize that so far as the judge is concerned, he might sit there like a phonograph and hear the arguments of counsel, and take the papers and records with him at the end of the sitting of the court, to be considered at his headquarters, wherever that might be. That never was a good practice, however. It is a very unfair practice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, he misunderstood me. I did not mean that in all cases the judge should reserve his decision until he went back to his principal office. But with half a dozen different places in his district where the district court judge sits, and where he frequently sits not more than a week, spending two-thirds of his time in his principal office, I suggested that it was unnecessary to buy books to put in the judge's rooms where he occupied them only one week during the year. I did not mean that it would be proper for him to wait until he went back to his principal office to decide the questions argued before him. But I suggested that at such a place he could easily secure from the members of the bar the temporary use of the Supreme Court decisions and the Federal Reporters. In their arguments they must have them at the courthouse, and they would cite the decisions, and they would gladly loan them to the judge when he retired to his chambers.

Where a district is cut up into half a dozen places for holding court by the district judge it is entirely unnecessary to put books at the office of the judge at each place where he holds court. If he is provided with them at his principal office, where he stays the larger portion of the time, that would seem to be an ample contribution of legal literature on the part of the Government to the judge.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with much that the Senator says. In the first place, I believe the courts sit in too many places; that the places for the sitting of the courts are too often the result of a desire on the part of some one to seemingly accomplish something for a local community. I have been somewhat at war with the existing system. But this morning I am compelled to lay aside whatever warlike feelings I may have on that basic principle and deal with conditions as they exist.

I believe the courts should be furnished with the precedents. It is well enough to say that the judges know the law or should know it; but one of the most important things in a Government such as ours is that the laws shall be uniform. The individual opinions of men are never uniform. Men yield to recognized authority, and very properly so, in the interest of stable government. So the courts should have, available and convenient, a history of the law relating to any subject that comes up for responsible action, whether the court is going to sit there a day or a month. Probably it would be wise to consider the question as to whether or not the court should sit at all of the places where it does sit; but we are dealing with the fact.

I think that is all I desire to say about the Supreme Court reports. But on the question of the Federal Reporter we have a much more complicated and expensive proposition. I now turn to section 228, which is incidental to both the Federal and the Supreme Court Reports. It reads:

> The publishers of the decisions of the Supreme Court shall deliver to the Attorney General, in addition to the 300 copies delivered by the reporter—

I pause there to say that existing law requires the official reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States to deliver 300 copies to the Attorney General at a given price, to be distributed as provided in this law and by Congress.

> Such number of copies of each report heretofore published as the Attorney General may require, for which he shall pay not more than $2 per volume.

Those are the old or what are called the back numbers.

> And such number of copies of each report hereafter published as he may require, for which he shall pay not more than $1.75 per volume.

It is more difficult and expensive to obtain back volumes than it is to obtain current volumes. That is obvious.

> The Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the current volumes of such reports, and also for the additional sets of reports and digests required for distribution under the section last preceding.

That is a duty. It is made our duty by an act of Congress. We ought not to be at liberty to repeal it in making the appropriation.

Now, I come to the Federal Reporter. I have no hesitation in taking the time necessary to make this matter plain, because it is of the utmost importance not only to the courts but to every person in the United States. We grow to think that we have nothing to do with that which affects only some other person. But these authorities and decisions are the basis of uniformity of judicial decision. There is nothing—and I do not except the Constitution of the United States—that is of more importance to the people than the maintenance of that principle of government. Drift away from it, and you are drifting toward individualism and anarchy. Maintain it and stand by it, and you are maintaining and standing by that which must lie behind and underneath any good government—stability and uniformity.

I pause here to say that in my judgment every government should publish its own laws. This system of allowing somebody to speculate and make a profit out of the publishing of the laws of the people, enacted by their legislatures, is not in conformity with good government. I shall not pause to criticize the result of existing law, law that has existed for a long time, by which we farm out the functions of government. But the official opinions of the Supreme Court, one of the great coordinate branches of the Government, should be published by the Government at the expense of the Government, and distributed to the people upon an equitable and just basis established by law. No man should be permitted to stand between the people's acts and the people's rights to the extent of a single dollar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I fully agree with the Senator on that point. I have understood—I do not know whether it is true or not, but I should like to see an investigation of it—that the actual cost of these Supreme Court Reports is not over 50 cents per volume. I do not know whether that is so or not, but that is what I have understood.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not be wise to confuse or embarrass the making of an appropriation at this time with the consideration of that question, further than to suggest it for future consideration. Therefore I shall not pursue it. But it is a subject worthy of study and thought. Not only the decisions of the Supreme Court, which is a coordinate branch of equal importance with each of the others, but the laws of Congress should be printed and officially distributed according to a fixed rule of law, so as to be available to every person. They should not be written upon high pillars so that the subjects may not know the law, in order that a trap may be set for them. The same is true of the executive acts of the Government. There should be a system of publication of that which is done for the people by their representatives without regard to rank or dignity, so that it may be available to all of the people without regard to rank or dignity.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is very interesting, and I think it is a subject that ought to be considered hereafter in the form of a bill. But I want to ask the Senator if he knows how the Supreme Court Reports are published?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I know.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have an official reporter of the Supreme Court. Does he get a salary?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I may say, without being charged with knowing too much, that I know all about how they are published. We investigated the subject from the beginning to the end. But it is not germane to the question now under consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we can save $100,000 a year to the people by the publication of these reports—and I think we can—it is very important that the Senator should let us know about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Merely because we investigated this question, and I officially participated in it, and think I have retained a very accurate recollection of all of the facts connected with it, I should not feel justified in breaking in upon the consideration of an appropriation bill for the purpose of recounting even very interesting history.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will tell me how it is done I should like to know.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall be very glad to do that without taking it out of the time devoted to the consideration of this bill. It is an interesting subject. It is one that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws investigated very thoroughly.

Now let us proceed to the consideration of the law regulating the publishing and distribution of the Federal Reporter, because that is the largest item. I read from section 229 of the judiciary act:

The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof.

That provision is not sufficiently guarded. As I have already said, it covers more than two different classes of publications, one of which is a duplicate of the other.

There is no occasion at all for taking the circuit courts of appeals reports, because they are contained in the Federal Reporter. The Federal Reporter Digest is a digest of all the decisions of both the district courts and the circuit courts of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho will suspend. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on Saturday I gave notice that when the unfinished business was taken up to-day, I would submit some remarks to the Senate upon it. By an error the notice does not appear on the calendar, and I presume as it occurred during the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which was withheld, it is with the manuscript of that speech. I do not wish to interrupt the consideration of the pending appropriation bill, and as I assume that probably it will be completed by to-morrow, when the unfinished business is due to be taken up, I simply give notice that to-morrow when the unfinished business is taken up I will submit some remarks to the Senate in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not occupy the time of the Senate except that such confusion arose Saturday in the consideration of this matter, I thought it proper to the extent of my ability to make it so plain that hereafter there will be no occasion to thrash over the consideration that was given to it on Saturday, and that there shall be a plain statement of the facts and the law in the RECORD.

I will proceed with section 229. I had read down to the provision for the Attorney General to furnish the Reporter and Digest.

Sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions.

Whether the word "or" there is sufficient to establish an alternative as against a duality I am not certain in my own mind. I think there should be an amendment there that would confine him to furnishing one or the other and not both. They are both very expensive. They amount to a vast sum of money, and if the Attorney General furnishes the decisions of the circuit court of appeals, then he should not furnish the Federal Reporter. But undoubtedly if he is only to furnish one he should furnish the Federal Reporter, which contains both.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. At the time that report was under consideration it may have been that the decisions of the circuit court of appeals were separate from the Federal Reporter. I know in the early edition of the Federal Reporter the decisions of the circuit court of appeals were not included, and the circuit court of appeals was a separate publication. But now the Federal Reporter includes both the district courts and the Commerce Court and the circuit courts of appeals. At the time that provision was under consideration it may be that the Federal Reporter did not include the decisions of the circuit court of appeals.

Mr. HEYBURN. It did include them. It has included them since 1891. I speak from personal familiarity with the subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, of course, the Senator is entirely correct, but where the Federal Reporter is furnished the decisions of the Circuit Court of Appeals ought not also to be furnished in addition. The publisher of the Federal Reporter issues about five volumes a year and of the Circuit Court of Appeals there are about two. The advance sheets of the Federal Reporter come weekly. Of course there is no need to duplicate those things. I should think that the Circuit Court of Appeals ought to be eliminated entirely from this bill, because the Federal Reporter includes them.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. FLETCHER. It includes everything except the Supreme Court reports.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would be very glad if the Senator would formulate an amendment that would eliminate it and then provide against duplicating these reports. It could be done in a few words in section 229. It is obvious that there should be no necessity for consideration being given to the furnishing of duplicate reports.

And also future volumes of the same as issued.

Of course if you limit this to a single publication in the beginning of section 229 that will run all through the section and obviate the possibility of furnishing two sets of reports of the same decision.

And distribute a copy of each such reports and digests to each place where a circuit court of appeals, or a district court, is now or may hereafter regularly be held, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Court of Customs Appeals, the Commerce Court, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to the Secretary of the Senate for the use of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than three sets each. Whenever any such court room, office, or officer shall have a partial or complete set of any such reports or digests already purchased or owned by the United States, the Attorney General shall distribute to such court room, office, or officer only sufficient volumes to make a complete set thereof. No distribution of reports or digests under this section shall be made to any place where the court is held in a building not owned by the United States, unless there be at such place a United States officer to whose responsible custody they can be committed. The clerks of the courts (except the Supreme Court) to which the reports and digests are distributed under this section shall keep such reports and digests for the use of the courts and the officers thereof. All reports and digests distributed under the provisions of this section shall be and remain the property of the United States and, before distribution, shall be plainly marked on their covers with the words "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving them to their successors in office. Not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the back and current volumes of the Federal Reporter or other publication purchased under the provisions of this section, and not to exceed $5 per volume for the digest, the said money to be disbursed under the direction of the Attorney General; and the Attorney General shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the back and current volumes of such reports and digests the distribution of which is provided for in this section.

I will say to Senators, while this seems a large sum now, it must be taken into consideration that this appropriation will not be necessary in future, because the appropriation covers the filling up of broken sets. It covers the supplying of courts that have none of these publications. The greater part of the appropriation will be expended for establishing these libraries, and it will not be necessary in future to do more than pay for the current volumes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will observe that in this section, as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, there is no provision for furnishing the district attorney with the Federal Reporter. From his knowledge of the statute, does the Senator know of any provision for distribution to district attorneys of the Federal Reporter?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no statute authorizing it.

Mr. KENYON. This bill proposes to appropriate $38,000 to enable the Attorney General to furnish the Federal Reporter to the United States district attorneys. I myself think the law was wise in omitting that provision. Any lawyer who has enough practice and experience to fit for that position should have a set of the Federal Reporter anyhow.

Mr. HEYBURN. That very consideration of this question was presented to the committee. It was suggested that probably no man would ever be appointed a United States district attorney who did not already have the Federal Reporter.

Mr. KENYON. Another thing, a district attorney, except in large cities like New York and Chicago, does not spend all his time or use all these books to do United States work. He uses the Federal Reporter and he uses the Supreme Court Reports for his other class of work. Then why should there be an item in this bill appropriating $38,000 to enable the Attorney General to furnish the Federal Reporter to the district attorneys?

Mr. HEYBURN. There should not be any such provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. The chairman has agreed to strike that out.

Mr. HEYBURN. That goes out under a general agreement.

Mr. WARREN. That is, the three lines will be stricken out.

Mr. KENYON. At the top of page 131.

Mr. HEYBURN. That goes out. Also I think the chairman has stated, in substance, that the appropriation of $96,309.50 will be reduced.

Mr. WARREN. No; I am waiting very patiently that the Senator may perhaps give me some light upon that item. All we intended to reduce was the appropriation from $74,000 to $62,000. I have not yet stated that I would agree to a reduction of the appropriation of $96,000, because I am yet without information other than that which comes from the Department of Justice as to what the amount should be. I will be obliged to the Senator if he can furnish me with additional information on the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. Briefly, I will finish with that. I have been discussing that section. What I have said with regard to furnishing the United States Supreme Court Reports has been under that paragraph on page 131 which calls for an appropriation of $96,309.50. I want to make this suggestion in defense of that item—that it is to establish libraries largely where none exist now, because the law in effect before this time has not made sufficient or adequate provision for building up these libraries, so that $96,309 will not be a continuing expenditure. It is to establish these libraries, and all that will be needed hereafter will be to make the necessary provision for maintaining them.

Mr. WARREN. It will not all be expended next year.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will not be expended until certain public buildings are finished and certain places completed for the holding of courts. There are something like 30 places in the United States, if my memory is not incorrect, in which we are making new provision for the holding of United States courts. The buildings in many instances have not yet been contracted for or the estimates have not been approved, and it will be three, four, or five years before those buildings are completed. This is made a continuing appropriation, so that when those places are completed in which the court is to sit of course it will include library rooms and all necessary conveniences for the establishment and maintenance of the libraries belonging to the court, and then they will be furnished to them. After that it will be a question of buying four or five or six volumes a year of any one set of reports to keep the libraries current. That is the idea. While it seems like a large sum to be appropriating $96,000 for the purchase of law books, yet when once appropriated they are the property of the United States and will remain so forever, and it is only a question of maintaining them hereafter. I see no inconsistency in the appropriation, either as to the amount or as to the manner of its application.

Now, that covers the United States Supreme Court Reports and the Federal courts separately.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand the proposed amendments from the committee now pretty thoroughly, and I am opposed to practically all of them.

I desire, first, to call attention to the appropriation of $96,306.50 for additional Supreme Court Reports. We are informed, first, that it is to buy 197 additional full sets, and that 86 of those are to go to the district attorneys and 81 to additional places of holding district courts. I am opposed to both. I do not believe the Government has any business buying law books for the ordinary use of a United States district court attorney. His office is near that of the district court judge. He can examine the books in the district court judge's office with perfect facility.

Besides that, I doubt whether any United States district court attorney has not his own Supreme Court Reports. Every capable lawyer has his Supreme Court Reports. The district attorney when appointed is compelled to move his office to the office of the United States district attorney, and he carries his Supreme Court Reports with him. He stays there four years, usually, and then leaves. There is no necessity for furnishing Supreme Court Reports to the district attorneys. They can use their own books. It is not a permanent office like that of the district judge.

It is important to furnish Supreme Court Reports and Federal Reporters to the principal office of the district court judge, for he sits there nine months, probably, during the year and holds his chambers court there, and they are for the use not only of the district judge, but of the bar arguing cases before him.

I am opposed to the 81 sets for additional places of holding district courts. There is no necessity for it. We are adding places all over the districts for holding district courts. In many of them the district courts are held not more than a few days twice a year. It is entirely unnecessary to put a full set of Supreme Court decisions and Federal Reporters in the office of the district judge there, not because he does not require their use, but he has no time in his chambers for a thorough study of them. The lawyers who argue the cases before him bring the Supreme Court Reports with them; they bring the Federal Reporters with them; and leave them with the judge during the adjournment for investigation. He does not need a complete set of United States Supreme Court Reports and Federal Reporters in a court where he does not sit more than a week twice a year.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose the judge does not find the decision that he might desire in the books furnished by the lawyers, what is he to do? Is he to borrow from the lawyers?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly, he can send out and get the books. The lawyer who has prepared his case will bring the Supreme Court Reports into the court with him or send out for them without any trouble.

Mr. KENYON. I am in favor of any measure of economy; but I do believe that where courts are held, even though the judge be there for but a week, he should have a set of the reports at his disposal and for his use, because I do not believe a judge should borrow law books from a lawyer any more than he should borrow anything else from him. The judge should be absolutely independent as far as the sources of the law and the books are concerned the same as in regard to anything else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the district court is not established in any place where there are not one or two or more lawyers who have full sets of Supreme Court Reports and Federal Reporters. The lawyer on either side of the case brings the decision that the judge examines, and the lawyer on either side is ready to leave them and asks the privilege of leaving them. We do not furnish a complete library to the district judge. They bring many volumes of decisions into the court room, besides the Supreme Court decisions and Federal Reporters, and leave them for the judge to examine.

Now, what I insist is that at the many places at which district courts are established it is unnecessary for the Government to furnish a library. When the most important questions are considered if a judge wants time for investigation he waits until he goes back to the chambers. Of course, wherever he can do so he should decide the questions at once, but there is not a great deal of leisure for the quiet examination of authorities where a nisi prius court is held not longer than a week.

I am opposed to furnishing the district court judges with the 81 additional sets or the district attorneys with the 86 additional sets. I am opposed to buying the 81 additional sets to scatter them over the country where the district courts are held but a very short time. The whole tendency is to divide up districts into innumerable places for short terms.

I am in perfect sympathy with the view of the Senator from Idaho that this is a mistake. It seems to be the policy, the people seem to want it, and they are going to get it if they want it.

For the reasons given I object to the appropriation of $96,309.50. If you will turn to section 227, you can see the different officers who are to be furnished Supreme Court Reports. Why should we send a set of Supreme Court Reports to the Geological Survey, or to the Bureau of Manufactures, or to the Census Office, or the purchasing agent of the Agricultural Department, and so on? The list included in section 227 is already padded beyond any necessity.

There is always a pressure on us whenever anybody has anything to sell for the Government to buy it, in just as many places as can be possibly suggested, and quite a large number of the places mentioned in section 227 of the judiciary code are useless. I am opposed to increasing them. I think we have already covered more than we ought to have covered, and that instead of appropriating money for more we can very well legislate to cut out a number of those contained in section 227.

Now, I wish to pass from the district court to the Federal Reporters, covered under lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, on page 130—$74,000 for additional copies of the Federal Reporter sets. That comes under section 229 of the judiciary code.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Right there I should like to call the attention of the Senator and the Senate to the fact that last year there was $64,000 appropriated for identically this same purpose—for these additional sets.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Under that appropriation there were 143 sets purchased, and, as I understand it, there are one hundred and seventy-odd back numbers still required to complete the entire sets. The appropriation of $64,000 only covered a part of the sets, and this item, as the Senator from Georgia will see, is for the balance of the sets.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Which item is the Senator referring to now?

Mr. NELSON. It is the item of $74,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not take $74,000 to complete those sets.

Mr. NELSON. I understand from the last statement of the chairman of the committee, and I think it is correct, that $62,000 will complete it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is, of Federal Reporters?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the back numbers of the Federal Reporter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the back numbers have been lost at the places for which we have been buying them. Is that what is meant?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no. There are 310 places eligible. There were only furnished under appropriations heretofore 150. That leaves 160 places which would cost $74,000, but at some places they have not a proper building or vault in which to care for them, and so in the later consideration of the department they say that could be reduced to $62,000, and it will cover so many of the 160 places as they can take care of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many places will they have? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. WARREN. The report states either 150 or within two or three of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That number were bought by the appropriation last year?

Mr. WARREN. That is what I said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But there were a large number already receiving them.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I stated. Those were furnished last year and the other 160 or so are still unfurnished.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say we have only recently inaugurated the system of furnishing these sets. So that accounts for the fact that there were only a few places that had full sets of the Federal Reporter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The district judges at their chambers have been receiving them, and they are found there stamped "United States property." I never called at a district judge's main office and asked for the Federal Reporter that I did not find the Federal Reporter with "United States Government" stamped on.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, in recent years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I find the back volumes there. I am opposed to appropriating $74,000 for additional Federal Reporters. If you will turn to section 229 of the judiciary code, you will observe that the additional places named are about 16. I do not know where they are going; the Senate does not know.

Mr. WARREN. I have stated that we have the direct statement of the executive officer of the department, to whom I gave notice on Saturday that I should want the latest information, and direct and accurate information, and I am giving the Senator the benefit of that as to 150 having been furnished.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where are they?

Mr. WARREN. I did not get a list of them. One hundred and sixty are unprovided for, and the law provides altogether for 310 depositaries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under section 129 of the judiciary code I do not see how 310 sets could possibly be used. If we are furnishing 157, I think that is plenty. I do not see how this section 129 of the judiciary code provides for such a large number.

Mr. WARREN. I see in the hearings here that it is given:

> Number of places holding United States district court, 310; number of places now supplied with the Federal Reporter, 146; number of places where district judges report they are not desired, 32; number of places where desired but where there are no public buildings at the present time, 16, etc.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am utterly opposed to sending Federal Reporters to every place where a district court is held. The same reason applies to that which is applied to the Supreme Court decisions. To put a full set of Federal Reporters at a place where a court is held for a week is useless. If we furnish a district judge one complete set of Supreme Court Reports and one complete set of Federal Reporters, it is all we ought to do.

Therefore this enlarged number grows out of the purpose to put these volumes at every place where a Federal court is held, although the judge only holds the court for a few days twice a year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I make this suggestion for the consideration of the Senator: These books are furnished to the Government, and is it not a very small number of copies of the laws or decisions of our country even within the largest figures contemplated? They are all the property of the Government. Congress may order that they be sent here or there, but should we have on hand less than 500 sets of the official reports of the decisions of our Federal courts subject to the disposition of Congress at any time now or far in the future? It is a very meager supply of the law to have on hand at the best, and in order to reproduce them in the future, should the Government conclude in the future that a better or wider distribution was desirable, where would we get them unless we have them on hand? Would we start out again to print them? It seems to me that as a matter of fact the Government should have a thousand sets on hand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield to the Senator longer. He has occupied the floor nearly the whole morning, and he is not elucidating the subject now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course if the Senator chooses to indulge in any discourteous criticism about that I will not interrupt him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not intend a discourtesy.

Mr. HEYBURN. When I occupied the floor I found it was all right, and I did not object to any interruption.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator is not doing it all right now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator that perhaps the Government ought to have 500 copies of all these decisions I accept, and to that I in no sense objected. But I did not think, as I had the floor, that the Senator ought to go further beyond that suggestion to an elaboration of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I meant was that I preferred for him not to elaborate that thought just at this time. I wish again to say that I certainly meant no discourtesy to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had no intention of elaborating it. I had concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I would rather yield the floor to the Senator than to have him feel that I meant any discourtesy, because nothing was further from my thought or feeling than anything but the greatest respect for the Senator, which I feel both in the Chamber and outside the Chamber. If my expression or conduct conveyed any other thought, I wish to withdraw it and to publicly disclaim it, for I never meant it and I do not feel it.

I do not think that these reports ought to be distributed all over the country in places where court is not held. I do not think there is any necessity for the National Government to buy great quantities of Federal Reporters and store them away. There are immense quantities of them published; they are found everywhere. It is not essential for the National Government to distribute them in order that access to them may be had.

I understand perfectly now, Mr. President, why these two items that we thought were duplications are found in the amendment, the item of $715 for advance sheets and the $850 item. It is because under lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, by the $74,000 appropriation, a large number of additional sets of reports are to be placed in different parts of the country. The $2,860 appropriated by the other House was intended to continue the sets already distributed; the $715 was intended to obtain the advance sheets for the additional purchases covered by the $2,860; the $74,000 is to distribute additional sets; the $3,400 is to buy the current volumes for the additional sets; and the $850 is to buy the advance sheets for the additional current sets.

I did not understand this on Saturday, and I do not think any of us understood it distinctly Saturday, but I think it is perfectly clear now. I do not know what the contract of the Government is, with reference to the volumes, and therefore I do not know whether we can legitimately insist that the purchase of the volumes for $2 a year carries the advance sheets. The district court judges certainly want the advance sheets, and, if the purchase does not cover them, we ought to add the $715 and buy them, because the district judges ought to have the advance sheets. If we buy these reports for $2 apiece, exclusive of the advance sheets, then we ought to pay the 50 cents extra and get the advance sheets, because I regard the advance sheets as exceedingly valuable. The truth is the current reading of the judge outside of the permanent examination of the volumes is largely had by the use of the advance sheets. He takes them home and looks over them at night, and in that way keeps right up with the current decisions as rendered. My serious objection is to the items appropriating, respectively, $74,000 and $96,309.50. I do not think it is necessary to buy those additional sets. I do not think we ought to do it. I think it is a waste of money.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Minnesota has carefully looked up this subject; and I think I shall have to suggest the absence of a quorum, so that we may have a full attendance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Kenyon	Poindexter
Bacon	Cullom	Lippitt	Sanders
Bankhead	Cummins	McCumber	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	McLean	Simmons
Bourne	Fall	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Gallinger	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Gardner	Myers	Smoot
Bryan	Gronna	Nelson	Sutherland
Burnham	Guggenheim	Newlands	Swanson
Burton	Heyburn	Overman	Thornton
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Page	Tillman
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Townsend
Crawford	Jones	Perkins	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a brief moment for the purpose of explaining the matters pertaining to these items in the appropriation bill, so far as they relate to the Federal Reporter.

Prior to the publication of the Federal Reporter we had no regular series of reports of the inferior Federal courts—that is, of the courts below the Supreme Court of the United States. There were from time to time in a sporadic manner certain volumes of the reports issued. I can recall some of Story's reports, Woolworth's reports, Curtis's reports, and Dillon's reports, and a few others; but there was no regular series of Federal reports of the inferior courts that the legal profession or the courts could consult. After the Federal Reporter was inaugurated it became very popular with the bar. By and by there came to be a great demand for it among the courts. Finally, some years ago, the Attorney General of the United States recommended, and bills were introduced for that purpose, the distribution of the Federal Reporter to the several United States courts and to certain officials. Several bills, I think four or five, were favorably reported from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. Two of the bills were passed, providing substantially for the distribution of the Federal Reporter in the manner set forth in section 229 of the judicial code.

The first of these bills which passed was Senate bill 179, favorably reported by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] from the Judiciary Committee and passed by the Senate. That bill went to the other House, and there was a favorable report on it there by Mr. Tirrell. It was placed on the calendar, but never passed. Subsequently, in the Sixty-first Congress, third session, another bill was passed by the Senate. That was also favorably reported, but was not passed by the other House. Finally a favorable report was made upon a bill in reference to this matter in the House of Representatives, and the substance of that bill was incorporated in section 229 of the judicial code.

I call the attention of Senators to the limited manner of the distribution provided for in that section as compared with the distribution for the Supreme Court Reports:

SEC. 229. The Attorney General is authorized to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter or, in his discretion, other publication containing the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals, circuit courts, and district courts, and digests thereof, and also future volumes of the same as issued, and distribute a copy of each such reports and digests to each place where a circuit court of appeals or a district court is now or may hereafter regularly be held, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Claims, the Court of Customs Appeals, the Commerce Court, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Interstate Commerce Commission; and to the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than three sets each.

The Federal Reporter is published in pamphlets such as this [exhibiting]. They are published monthly, and from four to six of these pamphlets make up and constitute a volume. I have in my hand here five sheets, which will constitute when they are bound—and they will soon be bound—volume 194 of the Federal Reporter. The pamphlet copies are called the advance sheets, and when enough of them are issued to form a volume they are bound like this [exhibiting] and distributed to the members of the bar who subscribe for the Federal Reporter. At an early date my recollection is members of the bar had to pay $4 a volume for the Reporter with the advance sheets. I understand that at the present time they secure those volumes and the advance sheets for three dollars and a half. The publishers of the Federal Reporter came before the Committee on the Judiciary and stated, "If you will take enough sets, we will furnish them for $2 a volume." Nothing was said about the advance sheets, and so this section of the code was adopted.

The paragraphs in the appropriation bill in relation to this matter cover two items strictly within the law, while three items are not provided for. In the last appropriation bill, that of 1911, we appropriated $64,000 partly to buy back sets of the Reporter to supply 310 places, I think, where court is held. The appropriation of $64,000 was enough to pay for the current Reporter and to supply about half, or a little more than that, of the number of back sets required.

The item in the bill—

To pay for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," to remain available until expended, $74,000—is to complete the sets. It is to provide what you might call the other half of the sets contemplated by section 229, the estimate for which was $74,000, but, as the chairman of the committee has stated, and he scrutinized the matter carefully, it can be reduced to $62,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. The sum of $62,000 is sufficient to cover that. When that $62,000 is appropriated that will be the end of that; that will complete the sets of Federal Reporters in arrears, and all we will hereafter have to appropriate will be for the current volumes.

I am informed that a sufficient number of the advance sheets are published every year to make from four to five volumes of these reports. The number varies, sometimes running up to six and sometimes as low as four. I inquired of the librarian of the Supreme Court to-day, and he said the average might be fairly put at five volumes a year.

When we have once appropriated to complete the sets, which we will do by this small item, as I have said, there will be nothing more to appropriate except from year to year for the current volumes.

The first item in italics, in lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 130, appropriating $715, is to pay for advance sheets. As the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has well said, the courts need the advance sheets as much as they need anything at all, and even at 50 cents a volume for the advance sheets they only cost the Government, together with the bound volumes, two dollars and a half, as against three dollars and a half charged to the bar at large; so that the Government is ahead, as compared with the bar, to the extent of at least $1 a volume, even if we pay for the advance sheets.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator his view as to two paragraphs here. The Senator will notice the House provision, which is not amended, beginning in line 8, for Federal court reports and digests.

Mr. NELSON. I am coming to that. I am going to discuss that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. That provision is to provide for the continuation of the fifty-odd volumes of the back numbers published last year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that, but if you will notice the language in line 10.

Mr. NELSON. But the other paragraph to which the Senator refers, the appropriation of $3,400, which, as I understand, the Senator from Wyoming intends to reduce by an amendment, relates to the volumes to be furnished under the paragraph immediately preceding. I call the attention of the Senator to lines 15, 16, and 17. The chairman of the committee proposes to offer an amendment reducing the appropriation there to $62,000, and that amount will complete the sets with the back numbers. The paragraph following that is to supply the current numbers.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that, but I want to ask the Senator is it necessary that we should appropriate this large amount of money? The Senator's bill, as I remember, as it came before the committee provided for the distribution of some 300 copies.

Mr. NELSON. About 300.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, it is proposed to add to that, so as to make the number about 700, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. That is a different matter; that relates to Supreme Court reports. This refers to the volumes of the Federal Reporter, which are published at St. Paul by the West Publishing Co. I am not discussing that now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, $74,000, as I understand, is for the Supreme Court reports.

Mr. NELSON. It is for the Federal Reporter; but the chairman of the committee informs me that that amount can be reduced and ought to be reduced to $62,000, and that will complete the entire set, and there will be nothing more to supply in future except the current numbers.

The paragraph included in lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 130, is not within the law, and the same may be said of the paragraph included in lines 23, 24, and 25, which is of the same character. Those paragraphs relate to the advance sheets, and there is no law requiring them, but I think we are all agreed that the courts ought to have the advance sheets, particularly when they can get them at 50 cents a volume. The provision on the next page, to enable the Attorney General to furnish complete sets to district attorneys, and so forth, is entirely new legislation. There is no law for it; it stands on a distinct and separate footing; but every paragraph on page 130, except those relating to the advance sheets, is strictly within and in pursuance of the law. I submit to Senators after the publishers have agreed to furnish those volumes for $2 apiece, as against $3.50 to the profession, that they are entitled to furnish the number for which the law provides, and it would not be anything more than fair and equitable to make such provision. Only a little over 300 copies of the Federal Reporter are called for, as against nearly 800 of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator tell me how many district courts there are in the United States?

Mr. NELSON. I can not give the exact number, but the number of reports to be distributed under section 229 is a little over 300.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does that mean to every place where court is held?

Mr. NELSON. It means where court is held; where there is a courthouse.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that we ought to furnish judges with these reports?

Mr. NELSON. No reports are furnished to the judge. It is not like the other provision as to the Supreme Court Reports. I will read the provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I understand that, if the Senator please. But I was asking his opinion whether we ought to send the Supreme Court Reports to every little town where court is held.

Mr. NELSON. That paragraph does not give the Federal Reporter to the judges and it does not give them to a lot of other officials who receive the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States; in other words, the Federal Reporter is not distributed to half as many as are the Supreme Court reports—less than half, I think, or about 310 as against 780, or something of that kind. I am not absolutely certain as to the figures.

To sum up, Mr. President, the appropriations on page 130, with the exception of two, are strictly in pursuance of existing law and ought to be provided for in the bill. As to the two small items, one of $715 and the other of $850, which the chairman has given notice that he will move to reduce, there is no existing law, but all who are acquainted with judicial proceeding feel that the judges and others who get the Federal Reporter ought to have the advance sheets.

As I said a moment ago, they cost only 50 cents a year, and, including the advance sheets, the cost of the Federal Reporter is only $2.50 to the Government, as against $3.50 to private parties and to the bar at large. As to the matter of distributing them among district attorneys, I have nothing to say.

Now, I will just add one word about the Supreme Court Reports. Originally 300 copies of the Supreme Court Reports, under the Revised Statutes, were distributed through the Secretary of the Interior, and a section of the Revised Statutes prescribed the persons to whom and the places to which those 300 copies should be distributed.

Afterwards, in 1891, I think, the statute was amended so that we added 76 copies of the Supreme Court Reports. So, before the judiciary code was enacted, the total number of the reports distributed under the law, as near as I can recall, was 376 volumes. Under the Revised Statutes a part of those were distributed through the Attorney General's office, and the remainder through the Secretary of the Interior. By the act of 1909 the entire distribution was committed to the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the judiciary code, in sections 227 and 228, changed that entirely. It took it away from the Interior Department and left it with the Attorney General, and more than double the number of reports are distributed—that is, it left it 775 or seven hundred and eighty-odd as against 376. That is the distinction.

The Federal Reporter is published by the West Publishing Co., at St. Paul. The Supreme Court Reports are published by Banks & Co., of New York.

There is another item here, which was in the House bill, providing for 15 copies of what is called the lawyer's cooperative edition. There is no existing law for that publication as there is for the Supreme Court Reports and the Federal Reporter.

By the sundry civil bill of March 4, 1911, provision was made for the purchase of 15 copies, and, as the Senator from North Carolina well remarked a moment ago, when I called attention to the fact, that was not a continuing or existing law. It only covered that appropriation.

So it seems to me, to sum up in reference to the Federal Reporter, that all the items except those for the advance sheets and for the United States attorneys are strictly within the law and are called for by existing law.

As to the two small items for the advance sheets, while they are not provided for by existing law, I think we are all agreed that they ought to be purchased at the price at which they can be obtained.

As to supplying 300 copies to the district attorneys, that is a matter for the House. I have no recommendation to make in that respect. While I think it would be some help to the United States attorneys, in view of the fact that the reports are distributed among the courts, they can probably get along without them. I say that although these reports are published in my own State, and I want to say in all candor to the Senate that while I think the district attorneys would be glad to receive those reports, I do not regard them as a necessity for them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said in regard to the reports, but I disagree with him as to the advance sheets. These reports are to go to every district court of the United States. Take my State. There is a court to be held at Raleigh, one at Washington, one at Beaufort, and so on. Those advance sheets will be sent to every place. Who will ever see them? The judge lives at Wilson. There is no court held there. He might direct the clerk to send them from Raleigh. What is the use of sending them to Beaufort, or Washington, or any other place? Nobody is going to read them. They will be in the courthouse. The judges are not there. There is nobody there but the clerk.

Therefore I am going to make the point of order against the amendment on page 130, comprised in lines 12, 13, and 14, and the further amendment contained in lines 23, 24, and 25 on the same page.

Mr. CULBERSON. On what page?

Mr. OVERMAN. On page 130.

I make the point of order against the amendment in lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 130, that it is not provided for by existing law.

Mr. WARREN. But it is an appropriation which is duly estimated for from the proper quarter and is recommended here by a standing committee, and therefore is in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us see about that. It says here, under Rule XVI, section 3, if I recollect aright—

No amendment which proposes general legislation—

This is general legislation—shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. This is a direct appropriation and is not general legislation. It provides for a certain sum of money for a given time for a certain purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. It provides for sending out these reports and, I think, is objectionable to the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Wyoming to say that the appropriation is estimated for?

Mr. WARREN. It is estimated for in proper form and is published in the original Book of Estimates of the Treasury Department for the current year on page 435.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the estimate is not based on any law now in existence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and overrules it.

The question is on agreeing to the first amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have been in and out of the Chamber this morning, and I do not know what has been said or what has been done with reference to the proposed amendment in lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 131.

Mr. WARREN. While the Senator was out I proposed to amend these amendments in several places. That one I propose to strike out.

Mr. CULBERSON. Because it is not based upon existing law, I presume.

Mr. WARREN. And I also propose to strike out lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 131, and I propose to reduce the amounts in three other places, as we come to them.

Mr. CULBERSON. All right. I will listen to the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 130, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, $715.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt. It will again put the question. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 130, after line 14, to insert:

To pay for additional books authorized to be furnished under section 229 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," to remain available until expended, $74,000.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "$62,000" in place of "$74,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 18, to insert:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for additional volumes of continuations for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, to remain available until expended, $3,400.

Mr. WARREN. In place of "$3,400" I move to insert "$2,900."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. After the word "twelve," in line 21, I desire to offer an amendment, to insert the words "including advance sheets."

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that this is the lowest sum at which the publishers will furnish the books themselves. We have reduced that amount. Now, I wish to say, for perhaps the Senator did not hear it, that the advance sheets will not be furnished when we pay only $2 for the volume. That is the determination, and it has been agreed upon. It is a mere matter whether you want the advance sheets or not.

Mr. JONES. Agreed upon between whom?

Mr. WARREN. That is the law.

Mr. JONES. My contention is that ordinarily wherever the publishers agree to furnish bound volumes they furnish advance sheets. I had a copy of the advance sheets here a moment ago.

Mr. WARREN. But they do not furnish the bound volume at $2.

Mr. JONES. They give the Government a special price because of the large number ordered.

Mr. WARREN. It is a special price, it being $2.50 for the volume and the advance sheets, while the commercial rate is $3.50.

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied the publishers will be glad to furnish the advance sheets with these volumes at $2 per volume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the amendment will not prevail, because if we are going to make fish of one and fowl of the other it will create confusion.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I certainly hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be adopted. This is an extraordinary sum of money we are appropriating for these publications, and the publishers ought to be required, at the price named, to include the advance sheets. It will cost very little money to them, and I agree with the Senator from Washington that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that 150 courts ought to have the advance sheets and the other 150 should not? That is what the amendment will provide.

Mr. CULBERSON. I presume an appropriate amendment will be offered as to the other in due time.

Mr. WARREN. The other has already been passed upon.

Mr. CULBERSON. But the bill has yet to go into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for a division.

There were on a division—ayes 15, noes 16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is demanded.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I make an inquiry with respect to the parliamentary situation? The proposition is on the amendment in lines 19 to 22, inclusive, and the amendment reduces it to $2,900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

There were on a division—ayes 15, noes 10.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 22, to insert:

To pay the publishers of the Federal Reporter for advance sheets during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1912, to remain available until expended, $850.

Mr. WARREN. I move to strike out "$850" and insert "$725."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 131, to insert:

To enable the Attorney General to furnish complete sets, continuations, and advance sheets of the Federal Reporter and digests to United States district attorneys, $38,000.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 131, after line 3, to insert:

Supreme Court Reports: To pay for complete sets and additional volumes, as issued, of the Supreme Court Reports and digests thereof, authorized to be furnished under sections 227 and 228 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," to remain available until expended, $96,309.50.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out the total, "$96,309.50," and inserting in lieu thereof "$70,000," and also the words "Provided, That the Supreme Court Reports and Digests shall not be distributed to United States district attorneys."

We have stricken out, on page 131, from lines 1, 2, 3, and provided that the reports should not be furnished to them, and for the same reason I do not want to see the United States Supreme Court Reports furnished to the district attorneys. I therefore move an amendment to strike out the total as it appears in the amendment and to make it $70,000 instead of $96,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, they have been furnished under the old laws. A part of this now goes to them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think not.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; they have always been furnished.

Mr. OVERMAN. They ought not to be furnished the United States Supreme Court Reports. I will venture the assertion that if they have been furnished none of them has a complete set. They hold office for only four years.

If we furnish a lawyer with a set of Supreme Court Reports, what becomes of them? He has no vault to put them in. Other lawyers borrow them, and every man has an incomplete set; and we are asked to appropriate money here every year in an appropriation bill to supply these complete sets.

Are you going to furnish a district attorney, a man that probably does not have his office at the courthouse, the United States Supreme Court Reports? If he has not got them in his own library, he ought not to be appointed to the position. Nine-tenths of the lawyers who are appointed United States district attorneys already have the Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, so far as my observation goes almost all of the district attorneys have their offices in public buildings, and have vaults there. Besides, these books are all stamped and labeled as property of the United States and can not be dissipated or hawked around.

Mr. OVERMAN. If they do have their offices in public buildings, the reports are right there, where they can just step across the hall and get all they want.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say another thing: There is not any question about these being provided in the new law or codification of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand they have been provided. They have been added. I am answering what the Senator says. He says that in nine cases out of ten the district attorneys have their offices in the courthouses. If they do, the Supreme Court Reports are always in the room next to the judge's chamber, and in addition to that the judge has them. There are two complete sets. What do you want to furnish him another set for?

Mr. WARREN. There are several courthouses in one district, for that matter. If the Senator will make his amendment, say, $75,000, and not put in any language at all—not bar out district attorneys—I will accept the amendment. Otherwise I can not accept his amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is too much.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will first offer it with that amendment, $75,000; but I intend to offer the other, and I hope the Senator will accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that $16,000 is all it ought to be. There is no occasion for sending them to the district attorneys, and there is no occasion for sending them to these small subdivisions of the districts. There is $80,000 appropriated here for those purposes, and the bulk of it is for these extra courthouses scattered over the districts. Sixteen thousand dollars is every dollar that ought to be appropriated. If the Senator will make his amendment $16,000 instead of $96,000, I think we ought to have a yea-and-nay vote on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I read from the hearings this morning that we are proposing to do something that is not wanted. In my State alone there are three courts held where the judge and clerk have reported that they do not need these books and do not want them, because the judge is supplied with them in other places, and the attorneys are supplied with them. They do not want them there, and yet it is proposed to send them there anyhow. It is proposed to appropriate all this money to send them books that they do not want.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, even admitting that each district attorney should have a set of these very necessary reports, I think that of the 300 sets which are given to the United States for free distribution there would be enough to go to the district attorneys, if it were not for the fact that each assistant to the Attorney General of the United States must have a separate set of these books; and not only that, but each assistant secretary of each executive department of the United States under this law must have a separate set.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that included in this $96,000?

Mr. FALL. That is included, I suppose, in the 300 sets for free distribution.

Mr. OVERMAN. We ought to knock it all out. The idea of sending these books to the assistant secretaries of the various departments and spending thousands and thousands of dollars to give them sets of reports that they never read and never look at! I admit that some of the Assistant Attorney Generals ought to have them, but there are so many Assistant Attorney Generals now that I think they ought to be limited.

I am going to offer this amendment in order to get it before the Senate, and then the Senator can offer his amendment to strike out the total:

Provided, That the Supreme Court Reports and Digests shall not be distributed to the United States district attorneys.

I offer the amendment stated and also one to reduce the appropriation from $96,000 to $70,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in view of the many views that have been expressed I hope that no amendment whatever will be adopted, and that the amount will be sustained as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 131, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the total, $96,309.50, and insert $70,000, and the following:

Provided, That the Supreme Court Reports and Digests shall not be distributed to the United States district attorneys.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we ought to have a division on that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In the event that this amendment should be adopted, would the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, to fix the amount at $16,000, be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be in order.

Mr. FALL. Not until we get in the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, it would.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator did not understand the ruling of the Chair. That amendment would be in order after the vote on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not be in order now.

Mr. CULBERSON. That was not the inquiry. The inquiry was whether it would be in order after the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated that it would be in order. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for a division.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Which one of the amendments is it that we are voting on?

Mr. OVERMAN. The one that proposes to strike out $96,309.50 and insert $70,000, and also to insert:

Provided, That the Supreme Court Reports and Digests shall not be distributed to the United States district attorneys.

There were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 17.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). Mr. President, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I see he is not in the Senate Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote, not knowing how he would vote on this question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SANDERS]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SANDERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] has not voted, so, as I have a pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BURNHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON. I have refrained from voting because of the absence of my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I will therefore transfer my pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BRADLEY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], but for which I would vote "nay." Under the circumstances, I withhold my vote.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON. Under that arrangement I transfer my pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 21, as follows:

So Mr. OVERMAN'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would offer a further amendment to this effect at the conclusion of line 10: "Wherever the Federal Reporter and advance sheets of the Federal Reporter are provided for, the decisions of the Circuit Court of Appeals shall not be separately furnished." It will save the furnishing of duplicates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment insert:

Wherever the Federal Reporter and advance sheets of the Federal Reporter are provided for, the decisions of the Circuit Court of Appeals shall not be separately furnished.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that lines 11, 12, and 13 on page 131 be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 131, as follows:

For 15 copies of volume 56 of the lawyers' cooperative edition, at $5 per volume, in addition to the distribution made by the Interior Department, $75.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment striking out the paragraph which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, line 22, after the word "Alaska," to strike out "$550,000" and insert "$568,000," so as to read:

For salaries of United States district attorneys and expenses of United States district attorneys and their regular assistants, including the office expenses of United States district attorneys in Alaska, $568,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 133, line 7——

Mr. CULBERSON. There is another amendment on page 132, line 8.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that perhaps the Senator did not notice that we had passed to this point and turned back to the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other amendment on page 132 was formerly agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. While the Senator from Texas is here I should like to turn back to the amendment on pages 125 and 126. It was under consideration for a few moments on Saturday and was laid over. I will ask that the letter which I send to the desk, which is a short one, from the Attorney General be read with reference to the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1912.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR WARREN: I notice in the RECORD of Saturday the discussion over the amendment under the subhead "Miscellaneous Objects, Department of Justice," on page 125, after line 15, of the sundry civil bill. May I point out just what that amendment does and the purpose of its introduction?

The amendment forbids the application of any of the appropriations mentioned in it to the payment of any compensation, by way of salary, fee, or allowance in any form (1) to any person who holds any other office, place, position, or appointment under the Government or any department of it, or (2) to any one hereafter appointed, designated, or employed who, within two years next preceding the day of his appointment, etc., has held any other office, place, position or appointment under the Government or a department of it.

The effect of the first prohibition would be to make it impossible to employ any person connected with any other department of the Government as an expert or as an attorney, or in any other capacity. For example, it would prohibit the department from having a bank examiner or a geological expert, or any other official or employee delegated from any other department of the Government to the Department of Justice if his compensation is paid out of one of these funds. It would also prevent a district attorney who, under the law, is not required to go out of his own district, being designated to conduct a particular inquiry or case in another district and being paid even his traveling expenses for so doing.

The second prohibition would make it impossible to retain a lawyer in any lawsuit for the Government who, within two years previously, had been retained in any other lawsuit. It would make it impossible to promote from one branch of the service to another a lawyer who had demonstrated his fitness for promotion if in his new position he would be paid from any one of these appropriations. In other words, for the purpose of preventing one or two alleged abuses in the employment of officials who had received other compensations under the Government in particular cases which resulted in their earning a compensation in excess of that which they had received in those positions, this amendment proposes to tie the hands of the Department of Justice by depriving it of the advantage of the knowledge and experience which may have been acquired by a former official of the Government until he shall have been two years out of the service.

On all of these grounds I sincerely hope you will succeed in persuading the Senate to adopt the committee's motion to strike out this provision.

Faithfully, yours, GEO. W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not believe this provision of the bill as it passed the House should be stricken out. It is true there may be instances in which it will operate to the disadvantage of the Department of Justice and to the embarrassment of private persons, but I would rather see the provision incorporated in the law, drastic as it is, than stricken out altogether, putting nothing in its place.

The three cases which provoked this legislation, without calling names, are these: One was that of a United States district attorney in the State of New York who had as district attorney engaged somewhat in the prosecution of the Sugar Trust. He resigned his office as district attorney, where his salary was $10,000 a year, and was paid in the neighborhood of $60,000 out of such a lump-sum appropriation as a special prosecutor in the Sugar Trust cases.

The other two cases were of Assistant Attorneys General employed in the Department of Justice at Washington, and in cases where they had been employed as Assistant Attorneys General they were permitted to resign those positions and receive appointments as special prosecutors in trust cases and paid sums far in excess of the salary they were receiving as Assistant Attorneys General.

It is a little difficult, at least to me, to find some middle ground by which the Government, in the Department of Justice, would not be crippled and yet we would prevent a repetition of this favoritism to officials under the direction and control of that department. In the hope that some Senator may suggest a way out of the difficulty and yet not strike this provision from the bill altogether, if my proposition is not satisfactory, I suggest that the provision be allowed to remain in the bill and that the following amendment to it be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of line 11, page 126, the following proviso:

Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply except in cases where the persons appointed, designated, employed, or paid shall have previously rendered service in connection with the same subject matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that covers it, Mr. President. I think the amendment should be this:

Provided, however, That anyone engaged in one line of public service may be detailed to another at the same pay.

I do not think a man who has been working as a district attorney for the Government and who has gathered information on a fixed salary ought to be allowed to resign on account of the information that he has obtained as district attorney and go out and obtain from the Government many times his salary in a single case.

Mr. CULBERSON. The proviso I have suggested is intended to cover that identical case and prohibit the employment. It may not do it, though I think it does, but that is my purpose in presenting it.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to call the attention of my colleague on the committee to this: It seemed to be thought, when we passed over it in subcommittee, that it would require considerable study and reflection in order to cover the very abuses which he has mentioned and yet not to make it too drastic, not to make a sort of monopoly amongst those who had never been in the Government service—that is, not to undertake to debar all those who have ever done service to the Government for two years. In striking it out it was not my intention, and I assume it was not the intention of the Senator from Texas——

Mr. CULBERSON. I have read in the RECORD the remarks the Senator from Wyoming made on Saturday and I agree with him entirely. He stated the entire facts about the reason operating on the committee which led them to strike out this paragraph in reporting the bill to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that if he restores it and adds the amendment he sent to the desk he will feel entirely safe, or as safe as he would if he allowed it all to be cut out? Then, as he knows, he will be one of those who will finally shape it up, and therefore would it not be better to measure up with the House conferees and see if we could not even improve it?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am so much opposed to striking it out altogether that I think it ought to be suitably amended in the Senate, if it can be done, so as to prevent a repetition of such scandals in the Department of Justice.

Mr. WARREN. As I heard the amendment read, it does not remedy what I think we all agree is too drastic, and that is for two years to erect a bar against everyone who has been in the Government service. For instance, a man may have served in the Government service and gone out to private practice. He may have been out a month or 2 months or 20 months. He went out legitimately, with no intention of being employed again. A matter comes up of which he has knowledge and in which he would render great service, and he ought to be reemployed by the Government. Under this provision, put in by the House, he would be debarred from such employment for two full years.

I think that whatever we may do here we ought at least to strike out all of the paragraph, after the word "thereof," in line 6, page 126. It strikes me that the whole of it is dangerous, and not only dangerous but uncalled for.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether his amendment—I do not remember its exact language—would debar the employment of a Member of the House or of the Senate whose term would expire on the 4th of March next.

Mr. CULBERSON. Not at all. I will read the amendment again.

Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply except in cases where persons appointed, designated, employed, or paid shall have previously rendered service in connection witht the same subject matter.

Of course it would not apply to a Member of the House or Senate.

Mr. WARREN. If I understand it aright——

Mr. CULBERSON. It means executive service in the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES. The language of the provision of the House is very broad—who holds any other office, place, position, or appointment under the United States Government, or any department thereof.

I rather doubt if the limitation the Senator puts on would accomplish exactly what he intended.

Mr. WARREN. I do not believe it covers exactly what the Senator had in mind, because, if I understand it aright, it would debar every man for two years afterwards.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am perfectly willing to cover that, but I do not want anybody to resign after being in the service of the United States on a particular matter and then be employed by special designation at an extraordinary salary, I do not care what his excuse may be for resigning. I know the explanation in these instances is plausible, but it is not acceptable to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand the view of the Senator from Texas is that where a Government employee as a district attorney or Assistant Attorney General has become familiar with a Government case, he should not be permitted to resign and then get an appointment in it on a special fee as a private citizen at a great deal more than his salary, and the object of this qualification is to say that for two years after their resignation men shall not be employed on special fees in cases where they have already familiarized themselves with the case as an incident to their office.

I think another amendment ought to be added to the first part of this paragraph, as suggested by the Attorney General, qualifying the first part of this section. The Attorney General suggests, and suggests very properly, that a case may arise where a man in one line of service is needed over in another line of service and that embarrassment would follow if a change now took place so that the district attorney could not be assigned to work outside of his district. I think there ought to be an amendment added to the first part of the paragraph:

Providing that these changes of work could be made and these assignments outside of their district made at the same pay that they were receiving in the former place.

Mr. WARREN. The Attorney general also mentions bank examiners and others.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had that in view. I think if the Senator will let it go over until to-morrow morning we can then work out some additional amendment that would perfect it on the floor of the Senate. I will try to see if I can not draw an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to submit that matter to my colleague on the committee from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I am perfectly willing to let it go over if the Senator from Texas will be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over for the present, and the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas will be pending.

The next amendment was, on page 133, line 7, after the word "compensation," to strike out "$315,000" and insert "$325,000," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 144, line 12, after the word "necessary," to strike out "$1,007,420" and insert "$957,420," so as to make the clause read:

Mr. BURTON. I raise the point of order that that is contrary to existing law. It is clearly contrary to the act of June 17, 1910, which reorganized the Lighthouse Service.

Mr. NELSON rose.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] will pardon me, I take it he intended to raise the same point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask if the Senator will withhold the point of order for a moment? I have an amendment to offer which may or may not be satisfactory to the Senator. On line 24 I intended to add "all other things being equal"——

Mr. BURTON. I think it would be quite as objectionable; in fact, in some particulars somewhat more objectionable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair assumes that the Senator from Ohio makes the point of order that this is general legislation.

Mr. BURTON. In the act of 1910 to reorganize the Lighthouse Board there is an express provision that Army and Navy officers may be detailed for a period not exceeding three years from the taking effect of the section. That is in section 11. The act was approved June 17, 1910. That is a limitation on the appointment of Army and Navy officers in the service, and this would be directly contrary to that enactment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the ground that this is general legislation, the point of order is sustained.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Coast and Geodetic Survey," on page 147, line 18, after "$3,000," to insert "Provided, That 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects named, but no more than 10 per cent shall be added to any one item of appropriation," so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 158, line 17, strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200."

Mr. WARREN. We have raised them 50 per cent.

Mr. JONES. I know that, but there ought not to be that difference between the warden and deputy warden. Furthermore, a deputy warden of any account in Alaska ought to get at least $100 instead of $75 a month

Mr. WARREN. They are there only a small portion of the year.

Mr. JONES. These men are giving special attention to a very important matter. I think if we have one at all he ought to receive $100 a month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Immigration Service," on page 163, line 17, after the words "Secretary of Commerce and Labor," to strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$2,575,000," so as to read:

Expenses of regulating immigration: For all expenses of the enforcement of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, including the contract-labor laws; for the costs of the reports of decisions of the Federal courts and digests thereof for the use of the Commissioner General of Immigration; for salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed to enforce said laws; for the enforcement of the provisions of the act of February 20, 1907, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States" and acts amendatory thereof; for expenses of necessary supplies, including exchange of typewriting machines, alterations, and repairs, and for all other expenses authorized by said Act; also for preventing the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto, and the expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expense of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation, and for the refunding of head tax upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that collection was made through error of Government officers; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, $2,575,000.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 168, after line 11, to insert:

For the payment of necessary expenses incurred and compensation for services rendered under the direction of the Secretary of State in the examination and preparation of cases involving the use, distribution, or diversion of waters, and other questions or matters of difference covered by the treaty of January 11, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain and in representing this Government and the American interests involved in the presentation of such cases before the International Joint Commission constituted under that treaty, so much as may be necessary, to be paid from the appropriation heretofore made for said commission: Provided, That any counsel employed shall be at a fixed compensation, not to exceed $4,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I inquire what was done with the amendment on page 161, line 20? I did not hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. That was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the RECORD show that it was read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

Mr. WARREN. It was read and agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was following the reading closely and I did not hear it referred to at all.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, all three of the amendments at the bottom of that page were read and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were read and agreed to separately.

Mr. LODGE. They were all agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Were they all read?

Mr. LODGE. They were all read and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 169, after line 8, to insert:

International Conference on Maritime Law: For participation by the United States, by officially appointed delegates, in the International Conference on Maritime Law to meet at Brussels, Belgium, in September, 1912, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 169, after line 13, to insert:

Arbitration of outstanding pecuniary claims between United States and Great Britain: For the expenses of the arbitration of outstanding pecuniary claims between the United States and Great Britain, in accordance with the special agreement concluded for that purpose August 18, 1910, and the schedule of claims thereunder, including office rent in the District of Columbia, and the compensation of arbitrator, umpire, agent, counsel, clerical and other assistants, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, the balance unexpended July 1, 1912, of the appropriation made for all the foregoing purposes for the fiscal year 1912 is hereby reappropirated and made available for expenditure for said purposes during the fiscal year 1913, to be disbursed under direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I inquire the amount of that fund.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know the amount unexpended, but I think it is about $50,000.

Mr. LODGE. The whole amount was $75,000.

Mr. WARREN. Then, it was in two different appropriations?

Mr. LODGE. It was in two different appropriations. There was one appropriation of $25,000 and then an appropriation of $50,000. That is the whole amount, and this is simply a reappropriation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the unexpended balance?

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. A reappropriation of all that was not turned in at the end of the year?

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Under legislative," on page 171, after line 7, to insert:

The appropriation in the sundry civil act approved March 4, 1911, for removing fence and wall around the Botanical Gardens and such grading, soiling, seeding, and sodding as may be incident thereto, is hereby made available for said purposes for the fiscal year 1913.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. I want to get an exact understanding about this new system of appropriation.

The amendment provides that "the appropriation in the sundry civil act approved March 4, 1911, * * * is hereby made available," and so forth. Has any of it ever been expended?

Mr. WARREN. Being in an annual bill, it has lapsed. The time for building the Grant Monument in the Botanic Garden, I think, has been extended. This is not appropriating any money, but is, as I understand, for the purpose of carrying out the original act. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on the Library [Mr. WETMORE] to explain the matter to the Senator.

Mr. WETMORE. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment now under discussion is the one in regard to removing the fence at the Botanic Garden, and so forth.

Mr. WETMORE. That is a reappropriation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of money on hand?

Mr. WETMORE. Of money on hand.

Mr. HEYBURN. And not expended?

Mr. WETMORE. And not expended.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a very good way of appropriating money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 171, after line 13, to insert:

Senate: For indexing reports and hearings when necessary of Senate committees and joint committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 171, after line 18, to insert:

Mr. WARREN. I offer an amendment to that amendment, to be inserted immediately after that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 172, line 19, after the sum $5,500, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting:

Provided, That the provision of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913 making an appropriation to defray the expenses of compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Senator from Wyoming if that is a part of the previous amendment?

Mr. WARREN. It refers immediately to the preceding provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Now, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following:

Inspector for the Joint Committee on Printing, as provided for in section 20 of an act to provide for the public printing and binding, approved January 12, 1895, $2,000, one half to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the committee amendment it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no part of any such sum shall be used in maintaining free bathrooms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to come in on page 174.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the behalf of the committee, the Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 174, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "four" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. WARREN. That amendment and the others indicated on the sheet I have sent to the desk propose to amend the text of the bill. I will say, so that all Senators may be advised, that they propose to increase the pay of 10 or 11 employees who are now getting $720 to $840.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why is it proposed to increase the number of clerks there from 6 to 10?

Mr. WARREN. It does not increase the number, but we have to effect that change in order to bring about the desired result.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask to refer to line 5, on page 174. I understood the chairman of the committee would introduce an amendment there, which I have prepared. If not, I will introduce it myself.

Mr. WARREN. Mr President, it was my intention to draw the Senator's attention to that—I have a memorandum of it—so that when the committee's amendments were finished he might offer it. It comes under a little different head, and it does not seem to be included in the estimates.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have it marked to come in on page 174,

Mr. WARREN. It does not seem to appear in the estimates, and after the committee amendments are concluded the bill will be open to amendment from the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that; but I understood also the chairman had intended that this should be put in as a committee amendment. However, I will offer it at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Government Printing Office," subhead "Public Printing and Binding," on page 176, line 21, after the word "work," to strike out the sum "$4,182,880" and insert "$4,331,380," so as to read:

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator desire to offer an amendment on page 181?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course the general understanding with Senators is that they will wait until committee amendments have been disposed of, but if there is any special reason why the Senator from North Carolina desires now to leave the Chamber, I will ask unanimous consent that he shall be recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall have to be out of the Chamber for some hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be received.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 181, after line 23, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. In reference to the amendment to the amendment just offered by the Senator from Wyoming, I desire to ask, Should we not change in line 16 the number of classes from 5 to 6?

Mr. WARREN. No; that refers to the classes that are elsewhere provided for by permanent statute. The items that I have moved to add are not provided for in the permanent law.

Mr. FLETCHER. In other words, the Senator proposes that amendment for the purpose of taking care of the fishery stations?

Mr. WARREN. It simply makes the money appropriated for fishery stations continuously available rather than to have it lapse at the end of the year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 195, line 3, after the words "internal revenue," to insert "chief clerks of the various executive departments and bureaus, or clerks designated by them for the purpose, the superintendent, the acting superintendent, custodian, and principal clerks of the various national parks and other Government reservations, superintendent, acting superintendents, and principal clerks of the different Indian superintendencies or Indian agencies," so as to make the section read:

Mr. WARREN. Now, I offer one more amendment on behalf of the committee. At page 10 there seems to have been on oversight, and I send an amendment to the desk to come in at that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

Huron (S. Dak.) post office: For continuation of building under the present limit, $10,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the committee will make no objection to the amendment and will allow it to go to conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me say that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and possibly the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] have been waiting to obtain the floor. I should like unanimous consent now to have the pending bill laid aside until to-morrow and to then take it up immediately after the routine morning business. There are three amendments which we have passed over, and after those amendments are disposed of, of course the bill will then be open for amendments which may be offered by Senators.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would not the Senator from Wyoming be willing to allow amendments now to be offered by other Senators?

Mr. WARREN. I should prefer not. I should prefer that all may go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have an amendment to offer, but I can do so to-morrow morning——

Mr. WARREN. Such amendments may be offered to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Because the Senator from New Mexico desires to obtain the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I gave notice on Saturday last that I would to-day submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution No. 103 and the committee substitute therefor. I should now like to have the joint resolution and the committee substitute read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the joint resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution and the substitute submitted by the committee will be read.

The SECRETARY. The joint resolution, as introduced, reads as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make, or cause to be made under his direction, a full and thorough investigation of each and all claims of American citizens and of persons domiciled in the United States, which may be called to his attention by claimants or their attorneys for damages for injuries to their persons or property, received by them or by those of whom claimants may be the legal representatives, within the boundaries of the United States, by means of gunshot wounds or otherwise inflicted by Mexican Federal or insurgent troops during the late insurrection in Mexico in 1911. And the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to determine and adjudicate the validity of said claims and the amount thereof, and diplomatically present such of them as he may find just and valid to the Mexican Government and press them for payment. And for the purpose of investigating said claims the Secretary of State is authorized to appoint a commission from among the officers or employees of his department, to consist of not more than three members, which commission, when advisable or necessary, shall hold hearings at such times and places as may be convenient for said claimants and their witnesses, and said commission shall have the power to summon witnesses, compel their attendance, administer oaths, and perform such other acts as may be necessary to determine the validity and amount of said claims.

The Committee on Foreign Relations have reported a substitute for the joint resolution in the following language:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make, or cause to be made under his direction, a full and thorough investigation of each and all claims of American citizens and of persons domiciled in the United States which may be called to his attention by claimants or their attorneys for damages for injuries to their persons or property, received by them or by those of whom claimants may be the legal representatives, within the boundaries of the United States, by means of gunshot wounds or otherwise inflicted by Mexican Federal or insurgent troops during the late insurrection in Mexico in the year 1911.

For the purpose of such investigation the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a commission of three officers of the Army, one of whom shall be an inspector general. Such commission shall have authority to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and to take evidence on oath relating to any such claim and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers in any such proceeding by application to the district court of the United States for the district within which any session of the commission is held, which court is hereby empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary for that purpose, and said commission shall have all the powers conferred by law upon inspectors general of the United States Army in the performance of their duties. Such commission shall report to Congress, through the Secretary of War, as soon as practicable, its findings of fact upon each and all the claims presented to it and its conclusion as to the justice and equity thereof and as to the proper amount of compensation or indemnity thereupon.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the public press within the last few days, the last day or two particularly, has been full of two or three different matters in which the United States is interested, one of which I believe is the investigation which was authorized or directed by the United States some months since into conditions in South America.

I noticed a day or two ago that in the English Parliament, in answer to questions put to the Government, it was there stated that the United States of America was expected to deal with Peru with reference to the outrages perpetrated by English subjects and others in the district of Putumayo.

I noticed in the press this morning that the people of the United States and some of the Senators in this body were very much interested in the report touching outrages upon certain citizens of Korea in the attempt, as it was stated, to force certain people in Korea to give evidence against certain American citizens concerning what purported to be or what was reported to be a plot entered into by those American citizens for the assassination of one of the Japanese officials.

It has been a most astounding thing to me to find the people of the United States, apparently the administration of this Government, and the Congress of the United States so little interested and that they have given so little attention to matters affecting directly the citizens of this country of ours now residing, or who have recently resided, within the boundaries of another country much closer to our borders than Peru on the one hand or Korea on the other. I have found to my astonishment that the people here apparently do not understand what is going on in the so-called Republic of Mexico near our borders.

I do not believe that the people of the United States have realized that within the last 12 or 14 months Americans in Mexico have not only had property destroyed to the amount of possibly, I should estimate at a low figure, $500,000,000, but that American citizens have been killed, American women have been outraged, within 50 miles of our borders, and not one word of protest has been uttered to the Mexican Government diplomatically, so far as I am able to ascertain, against such conditions and against such outrages and against such murders.

It appears to me that it is time that the United States, certainly the Congress of the United States, should give a little concern to the interests of citizens of the United States domiciled or visiting in a foreign country.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to take up, first, the matter with which this joint resolution and its substitute deal directly. I propose to show that the joint resolution should be adopted for one reason if not for others—that is, that it places the investigation of damages to American citizens in some other hands than that of the State Department of this Government of ours.

Mr. President, in April, 1911, Gen. Porfirio Diaz was President of the Republic of Mexico. At that time outbreaks in opposition to the Government occurred in various States of the Republic of Mexico. One of these outbreaks occurred in the State of Chihuahua, which is directly south of New Mexico and of Texas. The leader of that revolution, not originally against the Republic of Mexico, but purely an armed protest against the State government of Chihuahua, was Pascual Orozco, of whom we have heard so much in the papers. The present President of Mexico, Mr. Madero, was at that time in hiding in the city of San Antonio, Tex. When Orozco had made certain headway against the State troops and when finally the national troops were sent in under a misunderstanding, I think, of the conditions existing in Chihuahua to put down Orozco's revolution, and they were unable to do so, Mr. Madero, from the city of San Antonio, Tex., availed himself of the assistance given him by Pascual Orozco, did no fighting whatever against the Government of Mexico himself, but through Pascual Orozco was enabled to overthrow the Government of Diaz, which had existed for 35 or 40 years in the Republic of Mexico.

The so-called revolutionists appeared at Agua Prieta, across the line from Douglas, Ariz. On about April 18, 1911, the place was occupied by Federal troops of the Mexican Government. There is an imaginary line running across the plains, which is known as the boundary line between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico. The city of Douglas, containing about 8,000 American people, is situated on this side of the line. It is one of the most prosperous towns in the Southwest; and immediately on the other side of the line is the so-called city of Agua Prieta, in the Republic of Mexico.

The troops of the United States were ordered by the President of the United States to Douglas from Fort Huachuca and other points. They were given instructions. The governor of Arizona having protested to the President of the United States that the lives of American citizens in Douglas were endangered by the threatened fight at Agua Prieta, the President issued orders to the American troops at Douglas, and those orders were that they should notify both the insurgent commanders and the Federal commanders on the Mexican side that if they proposed to fight they must get away from the line; that they must go where they would not endanger the lives of American citizens.

No heed at all was paid to such warnings by the United States; a fight ensued between Federals and insurgents at different times, it was stated in the press, and at least one party to the fight, as has been stated in the official reports, crossed the American line. During the course of this little difficulty or fight there eight American citizens were killed or wounded on the American side of the line by the Mexicans on the Mexican side of the line, who had been warned by the President of the United States that they should conduct themselves so as not to do exactly what they did do.

As I shall show hereafter, nothing in the nature even of a protest was made by this Government to the Mexican Government, although her citizens were killed on this side.

Now, when Mr. Madero joined Mr. Orozco on about May 5, 1911, nearly a month after the difficulty had occurred and the killing of American citizens had occurred at Agua Prieta, the United States Government sent its troops to the border and again warned the Federals who were occupying the city of Juarez, across from El Paso, and also warned Mr. Orozco and Mr. Madero that they must so conduct themselves, and if they desired to fight they must get out of the danger zone, that they would not endanger the lives of American citizens.

For three days, in the face of our troops lined up upon this side of the border, with the dry bed of a river marking the boundary line of the United States and Mexico, a fight continued between the Madero insurgents and the Diaz Federals at Juarez.

There is an international street car line connecting the city of El Paso with the city of Juarez. Within five minutes' ride from the heart of the city of El Paso you can reach the city of Juarez. The troops of the United States Government were ranged along the river front to keep the citizens of the United States from getting too close to the fighting, and at the same time, as everybody believed who knew anything of the orders which had been issued at Agua Prieta, and which were again issued in much stronger language in Juarez—every American citizen believed that the troops were there for the purpose of enforcing American rights and not simply for the purpose of "running a bluff." But for three days fighting continued in spite of orders, despite the presence of American troops, and the United States Government failed to stop it. At no time during those three days would the United States troops who were there have had the slightest difficulty in stopping the fight going on at Juarez. For 51 hours of actual time bullets were coming across to El Paso and shrapnel was dropping into El Paso.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to this:

Of the three who could not be classed as having voluntarily entered the zone of danger after being warned, one man was shot dead in the door of his own home, only five blocks from the very heart of the business center of this city of 40,000 people—

This was an American citizen—

he was shot through the heart as he finished breakfast and stepped to his door to take a breath of fresh air; he fell dead in the arms of his terrified sister.

And the paper comments upon the action of this Government.

Of the 18 wounded of whom there is authentic record, not more than 3 could possibly be classed as sightseers entering a zone of known danger after having been warned; 13 of the 18 were shot in or near their homes or places of business. A man was shot while lying in bed in his own home; a little child was shot in the head while lying in her crib at home.

These were American citizens, now, that I am referring to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On American soil?

Mr. FALL. On American soil. A woman 84 years old was shot in the head as she left her home on the way to church; another woman was shot through the body as she was engaged in housework at home; another woman was shot in the eye as she was engaged in lawful occupations far from the scene of the fighting; another woman was shot through the neck in her own home; a laborer was shot in the eye as he was about to enter his door; a man was shot as he sat in the principal plaza in the heart of El Paso, nearly two miles from the scene of the fighting.

Several of those shot were at the time a mile, a mile and a half, or even more, from the scene of the fighting. Bullets were flying all over El Paso within a range of 3 miles from the scene of the battle. Shrapnel shell came half a mile within American territory. Scores of residences and business buildings were struck by bullets, and windows were broken in the city as far from the scene of the fighting as the White House in Washington from the Congressional Library, or as far as Thomas Circle in Washington from the Soldiers' Home, or as far as Scott Circle in Washington from the National Zoological Park.

The first day the American military commandant, acting under orders from Washington, in person gave direct and positive orders that there must be no firing toward the American side. He communicated these "direct warnings," such as the President talks about in reference to the Agua Prieta fight, to the recognized commanders of both the contending factions.

Mr. President, I am going hastily to review a few of the other outrages upon American citizens against which there has been no protest, and concerning which the administration, through the State Department here, has absolutely refused even to make diplomatic representations to the Mexican Government. I am going very rapidly to sketch a few of these outrages.

Converse and Blatt were both arrested on American soil, taken across from the United States to Mexico, and placed in a Mexican jail incommunicado, as it is called, under the claim that they had been engaged as private soldiers in Madero's command. President Diaz released Converse and Blatt because they were arrested on American soil. When Converse filed a claim with the State Department of the United States Government for damages for his arrest on American soil, although the Mexican Government had turned him loose because of his arrest on this side, the answer was made to his father and to his mother that he was arrested on the Mexican side, and that in any event the State Department here could take no interest in such matters against a friendly country.

Mr. OVERMAN. What was the fact about it? Was he really arrested on this side?

Mr. FALL. The fact of the matter was that he was arrested on American soil, and taken across to Mexico and put in jail. That was established to the satisfaction of the Mexican Government, who itself turned him loose. Then, when he asked damages for it, he was told by his own Government that they could not present his case because he was arrested on Mexican soil, which was the original claim of the Mexican Government.

Father Pinto, a Catholic priest, was arrested in Juarez, taken from the international street car line, and compelled to agree to pay $100 to the Mexicans upon the other side before they would allow him to get back on the car and come across to this side of the line. He was and is an American citizen, residing on this side. He had to pay $100 before they would allow him to come back on the street car line. In spite of his protest, no action has been taken, no apology has been extended by the Mexican Government, and nothing whatsoever has been done with reference to it.

A short time ago $5,000 worth of flour belonging to an American citizen was ordered by the President of the United States to be placed under the seal of the American consulate in the city of Juarez; and it was so placed under the charge of the American consul by the direct order of the President of the United States. The house was broken open; the American seal was not a sacred seal or sign to these gentlemen. Not one word of protest has been made. Although every sack of the flour of this American citizen was taken out of the house with the seal of the American consulate upon it, no protest or apology has been made, and no apology demanded.

Here is the case of an American regular soldier: The regular soldiers are still guarding the border for the purpose of seeing that no aid or assistance is extended to the Orozco revolutionists across the border. American soldiers are parading the border; American sentinels are stationed along the international border. One of them was shot at three or four times within the last month while pacing his beat, and was finally wounded by a shot fired from the other side. As far as we have been able to discover, not even an investigation has been made of the outrage; no protest has been made, and no apology has been either demanded or extended. This was an American soldier in uniform.

Mexican soldiers crossed the border—insurgents, so called—within the last two months in the face of American troops, and, standing on the international line, the American troops were told by the Mexican soldiers to get back. Guns were drawn upon the soldiers in our uniform, and they retreated 200 yards, because of their orders that under no circumstances should trouble be precipitated between the United States and Mexico; no, not even between the United States and the insurgent troops coming across from the State of Chihuahua in the so-called Republic of Mexico. Two Texas rangers, as it happened, were near at hand, and when the United States troops withdrew those two rangers, armed only with .45-caliber six-shooters, walked down to the international border and drove the 200 Mexicans back across the line, telling them that if they came over the line again these two men would arrest every one of them and put them in jail; and they stayed away. No protest has been made, no apology has been demanded or extended, although these armed troops came across the Mexican border.

Now, I am going as rapidly as possible to call the attention of the Senate to some of the things that have gone on down in the Republic of Mexico itself. I noticed that a day or two ago two or three Senators, if I may be allowed to refer to the reports in the public press, called at the State Department, being interested in questions indirectly affecting American citizens in Korea. I have not yet heard of United States Senators calling upon the State Department to learn the truth, if any, of the reports of murders and outrages committed upon American citizens in the Republic of Mexico. Why this silence and why this want of interest?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that, so far as we are concerned, no complaints have been brought to our attention about Georgians in Mexico. That is the reason we have not been to the State Department for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is only interested, then, in so far as complaint is made that in Korea some citizens of Georgia have had their lives or their liberty threatened?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but we were requested to interest ourselves in the Korean matter because some of the parties were missionaries from Georgia, and another one of them was a graduate of one of our colleges, and our Georgia bishops were very much interested, and we therefore took up the matter. I do not mean to intimate that Senators should fail to interest themselves in Americans in Mexico. I only desired to explain why we were active in the case of Korea, and to say that had similar situations presented themselves to us with reference to those who particularly concerned us, we would not have neglected them because they were in Mexico.

Mr. FALL. To avail myself in this matter of the very valuable assistance of the Senator from Georgia, I could almost wish some Georgian had been suffering at the hands of the Mexicans.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have no conception of what is going on, of the true condition of affairs, south of our border, in the States which constitute the so-called Mexican Republic.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator once more, in order to have him entirely correct in his statements. There have been two or three cases in which Georgians were concerned, and several about which I have called on the State Department. So far as we can learn, they gave us all the aid they could. I think this statement on my part is due to the State Department.

Mr. FALL. Were any of the Georgians in jail?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. FALL. Have any of them been killed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. FALL. Have they lost property?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They were in situations where they thought their property was in danger, and possibly their lives were in danger. In one instance a number of Georgians and other Americans had gotten together for self-defense.

Mr. FALL. And the State Department helped them out?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The State Department communicated with the American representatives in Mexico, and I think they did all they could. They were able to reach the coast, and so far as we know they were protected. Some of them lost some of their property, and they feel that something should be done for them. This was farther down in Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Has the Senator had any assurance that anything will be done for them about the loss of their property?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know how much of their property has been lost. We have not had an exact statement on that subject, nor have we been called upon to say anything with reference to it. I want to say to the Senator, however, that this was not near the line. I understand the troubles have been more serious in the northern part of Mexico. The places to which I refer were nearer the central portion of Mexico and were more easily handled.

I do not mean by what I say to disagree in any sense to the views expressed by the Senator, for they interest me very much, indeed. I should not have interrupted him had he not called attention to the Korean incident.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of making set speeches or prepared speeches. I have no speech prepared. The papers lying before me are simply proofs of the facts I am now stating—exhibits, as it were, to my remarks. As I am not making a set speech, nor attempting to do so, I welcome suggestions or interruptions from any of the Members of the Senate.

I shall refer a little later to some of the questions which have agitated the minds of some people who do know something of what is going on in Mexico as to the reason we do not hear more protests from Mexico—why the voices of more American citizens, even from Georgia, are not heard in these halls. I think I can give the Senator sufficient reason for the silence of Americans under insults, and even when their property and lives are threatened in Mexico. I think I can satisfy the Senator that they have very good reasons for keeping as quiet as possible.

I am going to confine my statements now, with reference to outrages or with reference to injuries to property and persons, largely to the northern States of Mexico. I shall refer generally to the conditions throughout the entire Republic. I think I shall be able to convince the Senator from Georgia and the other Senators that every report coming from Mexico is being censored to such an extent that the people of the United States can not gather the truth from any source at all coming through the Federal telegraph lines and the Federal telephone lines which are under the control of the Federal Government of Mexico.

Mr. President, just south of El Paso and south of the Arizona border there are colonies of American citizens, invited into that country as colonists by the Mexican Government itself. Certain concessions were given them as an inducement to persuade these American citizens to go over into Mexico. They have gone there and they have acquired property. They have built up beautiful little towns, where the Mexicans themselves did not go, because they were afraid of the Apache Indians. These people helped to push the Apaches back. They helped to redeem the country. They bought and paid for their property, and they have established various colonies, and in every one of them the schoolhouse is about the first building erected, and the church next, or the two are erected together.

Three or four years ago I visited one of the chief colonies of these settlers with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. He and myself each had the pleasure of addressing an audience in a brick schoolhouse two or three stories high in which were taught the higher classics, and were fitted for teaching and for business the sons and daughters of several hundred American citizens.

Mr. President, these people have been unfortunate in their experience with both sides during the trouble which has been going on now in Mexico for over a year. Protests have been made, but so far as I know nothing has been done to relieve the most intolerable situation which American citizens were ever compelled to undergo.

These people went there with a concession from the Mexican Government, under the terms of which they retained their American citizenship. That was one of the inducements offered them if they would go there and redeem that country.

I want to give to the Senate the names of just a few of the people who have lost property, who have been jailed, who have been treated with ignominy by the Mexicans, and I do not mean by the insurgents, because I shall call the attention of the Senate in a moment to the murder of at least nine men, and seven of them were murdered under the Madero administration and only two under that of Orozco. I am going to read a list of just a few of the names of these poor American citizens. They have not the money to buy their protection from the local authorities. J. P. Brown, Guy Taylor, Leslie Combs, John Tilford, B. L. Croft, Rulon Peterson, Daniel Skousen, James Skousen, Joseph Jackson, Loran Taylor, Harvey Taylor, George Romney, James Young, James Memmott, and many others of these colonists have been maltreated, abused, and threatened. More than a hundred thousand dollars in property, consisting of crops which they raised for their own subsistence, and the stock with which they raised those crops, have been taken away from them and no reparation has been made, and certainly none has been asked by the Government of which they are citizens.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has this Government been apprised of it?

Mr. FALL. Certainly, this Government has been apprised of this fact repeatedly, and even recently of the more recent outrages upon those same people.

Earnest Goldner, Mr. Hollingsworth, and many others have been maltreated and falsely imprisoned. Northwestern Railroad officers and employees have been abused, cursed, maltreated, and forced at point of musket by both federals and rebels to run trains. Losses to the Northwestern Railroad Co., Ketelesen & Degtau, Simon Pickard & Bros., Corralitos Co., and many other American and foreign companies in the districts of Bravos and Gilleana have aggregated more than $2,000,000, and there is no prospect of a cessation of these conditions in the near future.

Mr. OVERMAN. Were these facts brought to the notice of the State Department?

Mr. FALL. Some of them through their Representatives and by the same man whose name is signed to this telegram. You speak of your missionaries. That man is a preacher and an American citizen.

Mr. OVERMAN. What reply was given or excuse made?

Mr. FALL. I will go into that a little later.

With reference to these claims which are directly under discussion, to show you what reply American citizens have received with reference to the Department of State.

The Mexico Northwestern Railroad—

That is the railroad extending south from El Paso, Tex., skirting along these little colonies and turning west through the timber lands to the city of Chihuahua—

The Mexico Northwestern Railroad was torn all to pieces and out of commission most of the time—

Built by American and English capital and, Senators, you can know that England has protested—and the Mexican Central also put out of business for many months. * * * During the present rebellion both roads have operated most of the time.

That is, within the State of Chihuahua and under the charge of this "bandit" Orozco.

Nine of these colonists to whom I refer, exclusive of two women whose cases I shall speak of in a few moments, have been killed. The live stock and the other property of the colonists have been taken and they are afraid to complain very much. I will show you that other citizens are afraid to complain very much, but by arming themselves they have compelled a degree of respect; and now the Federal troops themselves within the last few days are down among those colonists, the Madero troops, the governmental troops of Mexico, seeking to take away from them the arms which they have finally acquired, for their own protection, and some of them by smuggling them across the border for their protection, because the Government of the United States would not even allow them to take them across the border. Now, Federal troops are actually engaged not only in undertaking to disarm them but they have also within the last week taken the milk cows, and the horses from those people with which they are now cultivating their crops.

What an outrage! It is not an outrage perpetrated by the bandits, because the same source of information says that Orozco has arrested his men who took the horses of these colonists and has made them return them. He is still in Chihuahua, and the federals who have been driving out Mr. Orozco so rapidly themselves molest the colonists in Sonora, and those federals are the people who appear now to be committing the depredations.

As to the looting by the Federal troops I have here a report from Gen. Huerta of the Mexican Army:

Villas's command stripped the town just before the rebels entered. Official report of Gen. Huerta, Federal commander, to President Madero says:

"The product of Villas's robbery in Parral was more than $200,000"—

That was gold—

"and he stole for 24 hours everything that came under his hands, and his hands were represented by the 500 men under his command."

Many trains have been fired into on the Southern Pacific line in Mexico and on other roads owned by Americans. Trainmen and passengers have been killed or wounded.

Trains carrying American passengers have been ditched apparently for no other purpose than the killing of the Americans on the trains, and no attempt even at robbery made.

Bridges have been burned on all roads in disturbed sections and railroad traffic stopped or seriously interfered with.

Yet, you have it told you through the public press every day, although these are telegrams which I am reading from, that Orozco has been defeated and driven out of Mexico, and that in a few hours, or in a few days at the utmost, peace and quiet will reign again in the disturbed so-called republic on our south.

American Smelting & Refining Co. plants at Velardena and Sasco frequently raided and forced to put up money, but plants not destroyed.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] might possibly tell you why earnest protests have not been made against some of the depredations at least committed upon certain property in Mexico.

At Velardena a score of Americans were stood against a wall and threatened with death if they did not put up heavy cash ransom, which they finally paid.

Yet they were in reach of the American consul, the representative of this Government of ours, and they were not so fortunate as the citizens of Georgia.

These men were so afraid to complain through official sources that facts never became known until two months later, when Federals recaptured the town.

This was done by the so-called rebels.

For a time the Mexican officials, with the consent of the American Government, actually searched American citizens on this side of the line. Rebels recently arrested a United States immigration inspector in Juarez as a spy. El Pasons have been arrested and shot in Juarez. Considered dangerous for Americans to visit Juarez, as arrests are likely to be made on any pretext. Homer Scott, an El Paso newspaper photographer, was arrested by Gen. Huerta, and when inquiry was made of Mexican consul in El Paso—

This is the gentleman I propose to refer to a little later—and when inquiry was made of Mexican consul in El Paso a false report was sent to Huerta from consul's office which nearly cost Scott his life.

That man—the Mexican consul—is not only receiving the protection due him as a representative of his Government by the officers of our Government in El Paso, Tex., but he is also securing the active aid and assistance, as I shall explain to Senators here, of the officers of justice of the United States in his efforts at times to incarcerate American and Mexican citizens arrested not on the other side, but on this side of the border, and putting them in jail for as much as 40 days at a time. That is done without redress and without complaint.

It is only fair to rebels to say that in many instances on entering cities they have furnished trains to take American women and children safely to the border. Mexicans have shown contempt for American official communications. For instance, at the time of the shooting across the line into Douglas, Ariz., the Mexican Federal Government formally charged American troops with shooting into Mexico and with taking arms from federals to arm rebels.

When we called upon them to stay away from our border and quit killing our American citizens they retaliated by saying we had helped the insurgents and that our troops had marched across the border.

Much trouble would have been saved, many lives would have been saved, and much property would have been saved if the American troops had been allowed then to go across the border. Our Government has never resented the charge made openly by the Mexican Government that our troops invaded their territory at that time. That was the answer given to us when we protested against the outrage upon American citizens.

Recently there has been more trouble threatened at Juarez, and Col. Steever, in command of the American troops, again notified Orozco, sr., that there must be no further firing into the United States. Of course, we would have walked off, I presume, as we have been doing heretofore, but at any rate the notice was served again.

The rebel commandant replied that the rebels would not promise to comply with the demand if the Mexican consul continued to recruit soldiers in El Paso for service in the Mexican federal army.

Which they accuse him plainly and openly of doing, and which our papers say he is doing every day.

Cases of looting have really been so numerous that specification is impossible. The German firm of Ketelsen & Degetau, having large stores at Juarez, Chihuahua, and Casa Grande, have been looted repeatedly during both revolutions. In February the Juarez store was robbed and burned, causing a loss of $250,000. Last week the Casa Grande store was looted and the manager, C. E. Hollingsworth, placed in jail.

He is in jail yet, so far as I know, although he may have been recently released, because the German Government might possibly have to be dealt with.

During the little recent trouble in Juarez, American citizens had their property not only destroyed, their stores looted, but one man, whom I happen to know well, had everything in the world that he possessed, about $10,000, invested in his stock of goods in Juarez, and every dollar of it was lost. I will show you what the course of our Government has been with reference to things of that kind before I conclude my remarks. I can simply say here in passing that no representations, even, have been made by this Government to the Mexican Government touching these outrages, so far as I have heard.

Mr. President, I do not intend to dwell upon the horrible cases of outrage in Mexico upon American citizens, because it is not my purpose to attempt to arouse any bitterness or any feeling on the part of Americans or of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that no representations have been made by this Government to the Mexican Government touching these losses and depredations which have been committed.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator explain why, if it is known?

Mr. FALL. I will come to that a little later, and I will undertake to explain over the signature, or at least by a copy of an official communication from the State Department made within a few days, in regard to damage cases.

As I said, I am not going to dwell upon the horrors of this revolution or of the former revolution in Mexico, but I do want to say that the indignation of the American people would be aroused to such a degree that all the American troops in this service could not keep the people of the United States from going across the Mexican border if they knew the condition of affairs and what some of our American citizens have had to suffer in the same colonies which I have referred to by Mr. Madero's own troops—by the action of people in accord with Mr. Madero himself. I want to cite one or two instances:

On January 22, 1911, in one of the colonies which I referred to a short time ago, near a little town, one of our American women, one of the pioneers helping to settle that country, was at home with her little daughter 11 years of age and a son of 7. Three of Madero's troopers entered the house and demanded something to eat. They demanded that this American woman, a citizen of the United States, should cook for them; and because she did not cook as rapidly as they desired, possibly, they shot her through the body. Then they insisted that she should continue cooking, and while she did so they took her little daughter and outraged her. When the woman fell to the floor from loss of blood they stuck a gun to her and blew out her brains. An American boy went to their assistance. He was met at the door and shot down. By the assistance of these colonists, law-abiding people, arrests were made of the perpetrators of this outrage and they confessed in open court exactly the facts which I have related to you. They were confined for six months in jail awaiting trial and then were turned loose and are now in that vicinity, unpunished, unwhipped of justice, and the American Government has not protested. I am not going to dwell on these cases.

Mabel Richardson, another little girl, was outraged within the shadow of that schoolhouse of which I spoke a few moments ago, where the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and myself addressed 700 of these colonists, principally pupils. Not a word has been said in protest and no action, in so far as I have heard or been able to discover, has been taken by this Government.

Coming down to very recent days, James D. Harvey was murdered on May 4 of this year—1912—while working in his field. He was shot down and then his murderer crossed the fence and cut his head off with a heavy spade. No attempt has been made to arrest him.

On July 2 of this year William Adams, another of these colonists, within about 60 miles of the border, with his wife's dead body in the house, was awaiting the coming of his daughter and son-in-law. They finally arrived at night, having come across the country in an automobile from Deming, N. Mex., driven by a man by the name of Evans, an American citizen. They went to the Mexican customhouse on the border and received permission to go across with the automobile. On the next morning Evans was arrested for not having a passport to cross the border line. No such thing had ever been demanded of anyone before, and this was simply given as an excuse for his arrest. He was confined in jail. The next morning the officer of the law of the Mexican Government, the customhouse officer with whom we, the United States Government, had been dealing across the line, went to Adams's house, met him, and accused him of being responsible for Evans having brought his (Adams's) daughter and her husband across the line the day before without, as they claimed, having secured a passport, although he had permission to do so from the Mexican customhouse officer. Adams claimed that he had nothing to do with it; that he knew nothing about it, as he had been there with his dead wife in the room with him. The Mexican officer, in spite of the fact that his daughter's arms were around him at the time, shot Adams through the head and killed him. That officer has not been arrested and no attempt has been made, in so far as I have ascertained, by this Government to secure his arrest or his punishment or that of any other man for perpetrating the crime.

Mr. President, when Villa was driven out of Parral, a mining camp in Mexico, after he, an officer of the Federal army, had proceeded to sack the town and rob the Americans as well as the Mexicans there who had any property, he left behind him or there was captured as he went out of the town an American citizen who had belonged to his command—Thomas A. J. Fountain. Salazar, the rebel commander, proceeded to try Fountain by court-martial.

Now, I am going to refer to another case in a short time before I leave this discussion in which other soldiers of an insurgent command, citizens of this country, were killed, and show the position which our State Department took. I shall read a portion at least of the communication of our Government to the Government of Nicaragua in exactly a similar case.

The trouble was that we did not reach Groce and Cannon in time to stop their murder, which was denounced very severely by our Government, but in this case we did get there. I have here the official correspondence showing exactly what the United States has done in the Fountain case, where she had even thrown the protection of our flag around one of her citizens. Fountain was arrested. We have a consular agent in the city of Parral and a consul at Chihuahua. Mr. Long, the consular agent at Parral, went in person to the commander of the forces of Orozco who were occupying Parral and made formal protest to him in the case of this man he was then trying by court-martial. I have here the evidence in the case upon which they tried him, and that evidence, given and furnished officially, simply shows that Fountain admitted that he had been a soldier connected with Francisco Villa's command and had been operating a field gun. The American consular agent demanded that the proceedings should cease, at least until he had time to communicate with the American consul at Chihuahua. The American consul took it up with the Government of his country, and he was told to stop the shooting of Fountain—the American citizen. Did they pay any attention to the orders? The consul communicated the orders to the consular agent, and the consular agent communicated the orders of the United States Government to this man Salazar, to the effect that he should not murder this American citizen who had been simply caught under arms or in the uniform of the Federal Government of Mexico. The next morning Mr. Fountain was placed with his face against an adobe wall and shot to death. Now, remember, if an American flag can be thrown over an American citizen by the consular representatives of this Government, at least Fountain was under the shadow of that flag. There has not been one word of protest further than that given at the time by the American authorities. I have here the communication which was finally brought forth. This case has not been followed up, and I want to say to Senators that you can not get away from the proposition that the men who committed this outrage, who committed this murder were recognized at least as insurgents by the American Government, because these communications were forwarded to them.

On April 9 the consul at Chihuahua reported that an American named Fountaine was to be shot at Parral, that he had protested against the act and had instructed the consular agent at Parral also to protest to the military authorities there. Notwithstanding this the man was shot at 5 o'clock the next morning, in spite of the protests made, and the attitude of the rebel authorities throughout was generally insolent, both to the consulate and to Americans.

On April 12 the ambassador at Mexico City telegraphed that he had no official report regarding the killing of Fountaine, but that he was prepared to act upon the department's instructions as soon as they were received.

On April 14 a telegraphic instruction was sent to the ambassador at Mexico City, and also to the consul at Chihuahua, directing them to inform the Mexican Federal Government and the insurrecto leaders, respectively, as follows:

This was communicated to both parties.

The Government and people of the United States have viewed with grave concern the practical murder under the positive order of one of your chief lieutenants of an American citizen who is reported to have been taken prisoner during or at the end of a regular engagement, the prisoner said to have been dressed in regular uniform and obviously one of the regular forces of the established Government of Mexico. The Government of the United States must insist, in so far as the treatment of American citizens taken prisoners by whatever force is concerned, that the rules and principles accepted by civilized nations as controlling their actions in time of war shall be followed and observed, and the Government of the United States must give notice—

Must give notice!

that any deviation from such a course and, indeed, any maltreatment of any American citizens will be deeply resented by the American Government and people, must be fully answered for by the Mexican people—

By the Mexican people!

thus tending to difficulties and obligations which it is to the interest of all true Mexican patriots, as it is to the desire of the United States, to avoid.

This was published in the public press.

Mr. President, when this matter was called to the attention of the State Department to ascertain what, if anything, they had done to punish those who were guilty of the killing of this American citizen whom they had demanded should not be killed, the reply was given that some one had raised the question as to whether or not he was really an American citizen. Information was immediately furnished to the State Department that the man was born in El Paso, Tex., of American parents, and was an American citizen, and the satisfaction upon that proposition of the State Department was expressed in terms. We had warned the Government, we had told them that the American people would hold the Mexican people responsible, and there they have let it drop. Nothing more has been done.

On another occasion something of a similar nature occurred. On December 1, 1909, a communication was sent to the ambassador of the Nicaraguan Government here in Washington. I intend to show, before I get through, that the conditions as specified in this note to the Nicaraguan Government as existing in that country at that time are the conditions as they exist to-day in the Republic of Mexico, except that the conditions in Mexico are accentuated:

It is equally a matter of common knowledge that, under the régime of President Zelaya, republican institutions have ceased in Nicaragua to exist, except in name; that public opinion and the press have been throttled; and that prison has been the reward for any tendency to real patriotism.

* * * * * * *

In view of the interests of the United States and of its relation to the Washington conventions, appeal against this situation has long since been made to this Government by a majority of the Central American Republics. There is now added the appeal, through the revolution, of a great body of the Nicaraguan people. Two Americans who, this Government is now convinced, were officers connected with the revolutionary forces and therefore entitled to be dealt with according to the enlightened practice of civilized nations have been killed by direct order of President Zelaya.

It was President Zelaya, in this instance, who was blamed for the conditions, but I shall show you that this statement is absolutely applicable to this case here:

Their execution is said to have been preceded by barbarous cruelties. The consulate at Managua is now officially reported to have been menaced.

The consular office of the United States in more than one place in Mexico has been menaced, and in the case of the consular office of the United States in Chihuahua, as well as in Juarez, seals placed upon the doors have been broken with perfect impunity by the Mexicans.

The Government of the United States is convinced that the revolution represents the ideals and the will of a majority of the Nicaraguan people more faithfully than does the Government of President Zelaya, and that its peaceable control is well-nigh as extensive as that hitherto so sternly attempted by the Government at Managua.

There is now added the fact, as officially reported from more than one quarter, that there are already indications of a rising in the western Provinces in favor of a presidential candidate intimately associated with the old régime. In this it is easy to see new elements tending toward a condition of anarchy, which leaves, at a given time, no definite responsible source to which the Government of the United States could look for reparation for the killing of Messrs. Cannon and Groce, or, indeed, for the protection which must be assured American citizens and American interests in Nicaragua.

In these circumstances the President no longer feels for the Government of President Zelaya that respect and confidence which would make it appropriate hereafter to maintain with it regular diplomatic relations, implying the will and the ability to respect and assure what is due from one State to another.

The Government of Nicaragua, which you have hitherto represented, is hereby notified, as will be also the leaders of the revolution, that the Government of the United States will hold strictly accountable for the protection of American life and liberty the factions de facto in control of the eastern and western portions of the Republic of Nicaragua.

And then the papers are handed to the minister from Nicaragua, and he is told that he will no longer be recognized by this Government. Yet in the later instance to which I have referred we are able to get to the parties who are proposing to kill an American citizen with a protest before it it done, and after it is done we remain silent upon the subject.

Mr. President, it is somewhat remarkable that a Senator should be compelled to refer, as I shall be compelled to refer, to some of the documents in this case as showing the attitude of the American Government and what the American Government has done.

I stated to the Senate the particulars, first, as to the killing of American citizens at Agua Prieta, or at Douglas, on this side of the line. That occurred in April, 1911. At El Paso, Tex., on May 5—I think it was on that date; I know it was in May of the same year—instead of 5 persons being killed or 8 killed and wounded, 5 American citizens were killed and 18 were wounded on this side of the line; and yet the President of the United States, in a message to the Congress of the United States in December, in which he refers to his telegrams to Gov. Sloan, touching the aspect of affairs, states that since that time nothing has occurred tending toward the injury of American citizens, overlooking entirely in the message sent to Congress upon this subject the killing and wounding of 23 or 24 American citizens in El Paso, Tex.

It has been claimed by the State Department—and it apparently is still claimed—that they have received information of every outrage that has been perpetrated; and it is stated in writing by the State Department that they have received information, in writing or otherwise, from the different consular agents of the United States in Mexico as to what was going on with reference to the citizens of the United States, and that they have been able to protect the citizens of the United States.

This matter under present consideration—the claim for damages by American citizens killed and wounded on this side of the line, with their feet upon American territory, by Mexicans on the other side of the line—is not a new matter. The matter of claims for damages has been pending now since May, 1911. The State Department of these United States was called upon immediately to take up the matter of the claims of American citizens and collect them from the Mexican Government.

Now, how did these claims originate? In the fight between the forces of Diaz, then President of Mexico, and the followers of Madero, who is the present President of Mexico. Whether the shots which killed those people were fired by the Madero forces or by the Diaz forces makes no difference whatsoever, because if fired by the Diaz forces or by the forces of his successor, representing the Government of Mexico, that Government is responsible.

The claims were presented, as I said. Finally a resolution was introduced in the lower House of the Congress of the United States by one of the Representatives from western Texas. While that resolution was under consideration in the lower House the State Department undertook to offer reasons for not pushing the claims of American citizens against the Mexican Government; and I want to say, without fear of contradiction, that the most remarkable principle of international law ever enunciated in the world was given over the signature of the Secretary of State of the United States to a committee of the lower House of Congress as a reason for not taking up these claims.

Every precedent established by our Government and every other is that as to claims for damages to American citizens or to your own citizens on your own soil, your own courts deal with them, your own diplomats take them up, not that you submit such claims to the local courts of foreign countries. But yet over his signature the Secretary of State, as a reason for opposing the passage of this same joint resolution, introduced by the Senator from Arizona in this branch, states that diplomacy will not permit the United States Government to take up these claims; that he can not take them up diplomatically; and he gives as his reason for it that international law compels the submission of just these claims exactly to the Mexican courts.

I am not going to take time to read it, but I have in my hand here a report on House joint resolution No. 255, of which the original resolution in this case is practically a copy, and I ask that this report of the committee, as it contains the legal arguments on both sides of this proposition, including the argument of the Secretary of State and his reasons for not pushing American claims, be printed in the RECORD as a portion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 556, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

AMERICAN CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. GARNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany House joint resolution 255:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House joint resolution 255, directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, determine the amounts due, if any, and press them for payment, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House, by unanimous vote, without amendment and recommend that the resolution do pass.

The necessity for the passage of this resolution will appear from a recital of the following facts:

In April, 1911, a battle was fought at Agua Prieta, a town situated in Mexico immediately across the international boundary line from Douglas, a city in the then Territory but now State of Arizona. Engaged in this battle, fighting against each other, were Mexican Government troops and insurrectionists who were seeking to overthrow the Mexican administration. As an incident to the battle many of the shots fired found their way across the international boundary line into Douglas, wounding a number of American citizens, some of them fatally.

Afterwards, in May, 1911, another battle was fought between the Mexican Federal and insurrection forces at Ciudad Juarez, immediately across the international boundary line from El Paso, Tex., and in this engagement shots from the Mexican guns were fired into El Paso, wounding and killing a large number of Americans.

At the scene of both these battles an American military force was present sufficient to have protected these Americans who were injured, but this military force was not utilized. The President contented himself with only a warning to the Mexican Government and to the officers commanding the forces engaged in the fight not to injure Americans within United States territory.

Following these occurrences the Americans who were thus injured, and the legal representatives of those who were killed, prepared their claims against the Mexican Government for damages and presented them to our Secretary of State, together with their proof, with the request that the Secretary present them to the Mexican Government and press through diplomatic channels for payment. This the Secretary refused to do, and instead advised the claimants that the American Embassy at the City of Mexico would, upon specific request of claimants, file their claims with the Mexican foreign office for presentation to the consultative claims commission of Mexico, but with the distinct understanding that in so presenting the claims to the Mexican foreign office neither the embassy nor the Government of the United States would pass upon the propriety, equity, justice, or legality of such claims, and that these questions would be left for further consideration and final determination in accordance with the rules and principles of international law applicable and controlling, when, if at all, it shall become necessary to consider the question of formally presenting complaints of claimants through diplomatic channels as a diplomatic claim. The Secretary further informed claimants that the American Embassy would do nothing more in relation to their claims than to present them for filing as before stated; that it would be necessary for each claimant, either personally or by attorney, to take all other needful measures in the premises, but that if the parties appearing before the commission should be dissatisfied with the findings of that tribunal, as approved or modified by the Mexican treasury, they might pursue their judicial remedies in the ordinary courts.

To this action of our State Department, relegating them to a Mexican tribunal for relief, claimants objected. They took the position that as they were injured in the United States and not in Mexico, and had never submitted themselves to Mexican jurisdiction nor Mexican laws, there was no authority in international law to require them to go to Mexico, the wrongdoer, for the trial of their cases. They contended that, as in all other cases of personal injury, their rights should be determined and the amount of their damages measured by the law of the place where the injuries were inflicted, which were the laws of the United States; that the laws of Mexico were wholly inapplicable, and that if it were the purpose of Mexico to apply American laws to the claims Mexican tribunals were not competent to apply them; that it was an act of injustice, if not indeed a complete denial of justice, to require the American claimants to incur the heavy expense, which they were unable to bear, of going to a foreign country to submit their claims to a tribunal whose proceedings are conducted in a foreign language and which administers laws of which they have no knowledge, and which has no power to enforce the production of evidence from the locality where the injuries occurred.

Claimants further contended that the duty rests upon this Government to afford its people protection and justice; that as to them it had not afforded protection, and in consequence they had been injured, and that it should afford them a proper and effectual means of redress, and that the only way this can be done in these cases is for the Government itself to investigate these cases, determine the amounts due, and present and press them for payment as diplomatic claims. Because claimants can not sue the Mexican Government in our courts, and for the reasons already pointed out, it is impracticable to produce the evidence or try them before a Mexican tribunal.

The resolution which is the subject of this report seeks to compel the State Department to act in accordance with the views of claimants.

To support the position of the State Department, which we have outlined, the Secretary of State relies upon the following statement setting forth shortly the history of the department's action in the matter of these claims and giving briefly the reasons for the procedure which it has followed:

"That from the time the anti-American riots broke out in Mexico City until the close of the recent revolutionary disturbance immediately following the American ambassador at Mexico City and the American consuls throughout the Republic, acting under standing instructions issued very early in the disturbances, were prompt and effective in their representations to the Mexican Government for the protection of American life and property. Whenever and as often as any particular case was called to the attention of the department, special instructions (by telegraph, if the case was urgent, otherwise by mail) were sent to the appropriate diplomatic or consular officers in Mexico. Moreover, pursuant to general and to specific instructions issued by the department, our diplomatic and consular officers in Mexico constantly reported to this Government the conditions in their various localities, so that, thus fully advised, the department was able to secure protection which otherwise might have been impossible.

"That as to the unfortunate occurrences at El Paso, Tex., and Douglas, Ariz., in which American citizens were killed or injured by shots fired from the Mexican side of the border as an incident of the hostile operations being there conducted, this Government made urgent representations not only to the commanders in the field, but to the Mexican Government itself, that steps must be taken to prevent the firing into American territory, and the reports of our officers go to show that both parties seemingly attempted to avoid such firing. The action taken was as urgent as it was deemed proper to make when it was considered that should the United States be contending with a foe, domestic or foreign, that had placed its back against the Mexican border military necessity would doubtless require that such foe be dislodged irrespective of the incident damage which might result to Mexican citizens on Mexican soil. If such a case arose on this side of the line, it is doubtful if this Government would do more than assert its willingness to answer in damages for the injuries which it might cause. In the present case the Mexican Government has indicated its willingness to live up to the same rule.

"To the end of meeting claims against it arising out of the recent revolution the Mexican Government has established a claims commission which has jurisdiction to examine into claims against the Mexican treasury because of injuries to the private estate of persons or for damages directly growing out of the revolution, for the purpose of reaching the amount of indemnity to which claimants may be entitled. This commission was established by a decree dated June 30, 1911, and was by the decree opened for business on July 1. The decree provided that no claims would be received by the commission after September 30. However, American citizens not having, for various reasons, presented their claims to the tribunal by the last date named, this department arranged with the Mexican Government that claims not already presented to the commission might be presented informally through the foreign office by our ambassador. Two such extensions were secured by the department, as a result of which American claimants, and apparently none others, had until December 31 last to present their claims. In taking advantage of this arrangement and presenting these claims thus informally through the foreign office the American ambassador, under instructions from the State Department, reserved all rights to make diplomatic representations later in each and every case in which the result reached by the commission was not, in the opinion of this Government, in accordance with the principles of law and equity involved.

"All American claimants were referred to this commission, because it seemed under the decree creating it that it had jurisdiction of all claims of every kind and nature, and because of the evident necessity, if justice were to be finally done to all Americans, of treating the entire situation as a unit. There was in international law no ground apparent to the department which would have justified it in discriminating between American claims or putting them in certain classes which should receive different treatment, and there was obviously no reason in abstract justice or in morals which required any such course, certainly not so long as ultimately no citizen would suffer by the procedure adopted, and so long as by making such discrimination some Americans would probably suffer. The necessity of treating the situation as a unit is evident when one considers losses suffered in the ordinary track of war, for which under the ordinary rules of international law the Government of Mexico would seem not to be responsible, and yet which were losses as real and severe as those for which compensation might be claimed. The commission being authorized to deal with all claims not only in accordance with the strict law, but with the equities which might be shown, it seemed most desirable that opportunity be given to present the track-of-war claims to the commission without the prejudice which would have resulted from withholding from the commission all claims legally sound. Moreover, no one has lost any rights by presenting their claims to this commission; indeed, all rights have been expressly reserved.

"Again, as it is fundamental in international law, in the matter of claims, that before a government becomes liable diplomatically the claimant must, save under certain exceptions not apparent in this situation, have exhausted his local remedies, it is quite clear that by presenting their claims to this commission American claimants have perfected their rights. Moreover, as the commission was specially constituted for the purpose of hearing and determining revolutionary claims, it seemed manifestly unwise to risk, in case the claims should finally go to international arbitration, a plea by the Mexican Government that the claimants had failed to exhaust their local remedies. It is, moreover, very probable that if this Government had so acted as to permit this plea to be used by the Mexican Government, the very claimants who now desire other procedure would have been among the loudest in their censure of the department for having acted contrary to this most elementary principle.

"As the proceedings before the commission did not seem to be moving as rapidly as could be desired, the American ambassador at Mexico City, pursuant to the department's instruction, took up the matter of the commission's early consideration of the El Paso and Douglas claims, and the President of the Mexican Republic has promised that these claims would be immediately referred for investigation and settlement, if possible, with the claimants, to the Mexican consuls at El Paso and Douglas, and that failing a settlement between the consul and the claimants, the cases would receive immediate consideration by the commission with a view to reaching an early adjustment.

"The right of the Government of Mexico to establish a tribunal to hear the evidence presented by any and all claimants against the Mexican Government, in order that the Government might adjust such claims, is certainly too clear to call for extended argument. The underlying principle was laid down by Mr. Jefferson, who in instructing, as Secretary of State, our representative at Paris, under date of March 12, 1793, stated:

"'We surely can not deny to any nation that right whereon our own Government is founded—that everyone may govern itself according to whatever form it pleases, and change these forms at its own will, and that it may transact its business with foreign nations through whatever organ it thinks proper, whether king, convention, assembly, committee, president, or anything else it may choose. The will of the nation is the only thing essential to be regarded.' (1 Moore's Digest, p. 120.)

"Later Webster announced the same fundamental principle in an instruction to Mr. Reeves, under date of January 25, 1852. Mr. Webster used the following language:

"'From President Washington's time down to the present day it has been a principle, always acknowledged by the United States, that every nation possesses a right to govern itself according to its own will, to change institutions at discretion, and to transact its business through whatever agents it may think proper to employ.' (Op. cit., p. 126.)

"To these expressions, and as complementary to them, there should be added the doctrine announced by Secretary Bayard in a note to the Spanish minister at this Capital in which Secretary Bayard, urging the right of this Government to refer persons having claims against it to the tribunals to be constituted by us for that purpose, used the following language:

"'It may, however, be rightfully maintained, as has frequently been done by both this Government and that of Great Britain, that when a sovereign rests his administration, so far as concerns claims against himself, primarily on his judiciary, and when such tribunals are open to aliens for redress to them, aliens claiming to be aggrieved should at first resort.' (For. Rel., 1887, p. 1022.)

"It is, therefore, entirely clear that the Mexican Government was wholly free to adopt such means as it chose for the purpose of passing upon claims of aliens against the Government, providing, of course, the procedure adopted was not unreasonable.

"The propriety of the action of the department in referring all claimants in the first instance to this commission, whatever the nature of their injury and their rights thereunder, is sufficiently established by other rules set forth by various Secretaries of State and by the Supreme Court itself.

"In 1855 Mr. Marcy, directing our minister to Peru, said:

"'The natives of the foreign country seek redress for wrongs through the judicial tribunals or in the form of petitions to the executive or legislative authorities. Foreigners are bound to pursue the same course unless there should be a positive and unequivocal treaty stipulation imparting to them privileges superior to those enjoyed by the natives of the country. It is only when the judicial tribunals are not accessible, or act corruptly, or are used as instruments to oppress our citizens or deprive them of their rights of property, that cases are presented for the interference of this Government in their behalf.' (6 Moore's Digest, p. 659.)

"In 1874 Secretary Fish, writing to Mr. Lawrence, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, House of Representatives, regarding a bill to provide for the adjudication of the claims of aliens arising out of our Civil War, expressed the same principle as follows:

"'In the intercourse of nations it is an admitted principle of comity that where the local courts afford a remedy, and where there is no reason to distrust the firmness and sense of equity of those courts, a claim will not be urged diplomatically until the local remedy shall be exhausted unless good and satisfactory reasons can be shown for not pursuing the remedy to the highest court of appeal.'" (See H. Rept. No. 134, 43d Cong., 2d sess., p. 5.)

"Later, in 1893, Mr. Gresham announced the same principle in the following language:

"'There is no principle of international law which makes it the duty of one nation to assume the collection of claims of its citizens against another nation if the citizens themselves have ample means of redress without the intervention of their government. Indeed, Sir Robert Phillimore says, in his Commentaries on International Law, volume 2, second edition, page 12: "As a general rule, the proposition of Martens seems to be correct, that the foreigner can only claim to be put on the same footing as the native creditor of the State."'" (108 U. S., p. 90.)

"The custom of nations in settling war claims has always been in accordance with the principles set forth in the above quotations.

"In view of these facts and circumstances the Secretary thinks that congressional activity in this matter would embarrass rather than facilitate the present negotiations for settlement of American claims. A resolution, such as this proposed regarding the El Paso and Douglas claims, would doubtless bring forth other resolutions on behalf of classes of other American claims, with the result that the whole situation, which so far has been conducted entirely in accordance with international precedents, would be thrown into confusion."

The Secretary assures the committee that he will continue to do everything in his power to secure for all American citizens the utmost to which their rights entitle them.

To the foregoing contentions of the Secretary of State, Representative SMITH of Texas, author of the resolution, has made the following reply:

"In considering House joint resolution No. 205, relating to the claims against Mexico of Americans who were injured in our own country, it is irrelevant to discuss whether or not our Government failed to afford those Americans the protection due them or whether or not Americans injured within the confines of Mexico should be required to look to Mexican tribunals for redress.

"Both these questions are entirely beside the true issue. Whether our Government should have intervened for the protection of those Americans who were wounded on the American side by bullets fired across the boundary line from the Mexican side can not have the slightest bearing one way or the other on the question of the liability of the Mexican Government for damages to the Americans so injured. Neither has the fact that the Secretary of State claims to have used diligence during the progress of the insurrection to afford protection to Americans who happened to be resident or transient in Mexico anything whatever to do with this question.

"I quite agree that under principles of international law Americans who suffered damage to either person or property in Mexico would be required to exhaust their local remedies in the manner provided by Mexico herself before appealing to our Government for assistance.

"But my resolution is not in behalf of people injured in Mexico. It is in behalf of people who were injured wholly on American soil, in their own homes, living under American laws, and who had not submitted themselves to Mexican jurisdiction in any way.

"The two classes of claims are upon entirely different footing. When a person goes into a foreign country he becomes subject to the jurisdiction of that country and must prosecute and defend his rights in the courts of that country. Being subject to the laws of the foreign country, his rights are determined by the courts in accordance with the law thereof and not the laws of the country from whence he came.

"All this a person is assumed to agree to when he goes into a foreign country, and he assumes all the risks incident thereto. And as long as he receives the same treatment at the hands of such foreign government as is accorded to its own citizens, he will have no grounds for complaint.

"But a person injured in his own country is entitled to have his rights measured and determined by the laws and tribunals of his own country, regardless of the question as to who violated his rights. Not having submitted himself voluntarily to the laws or jurisdiction of a foreign country, his own Government has no right to compel him to do so.

"In the case in hand the violation of the rights of these American citizens was a violation of American not Mexican law. And I want to ask by what principle of international law or justice Mexico can claim the right to apply Mexican law to them, or even to administer American law in a Mexican tribunal?

"Under the law of nations every organized government owes a duty to foreigners residing or sojourning within its domain. As a general rule it must afford them the same degree of protection and access to its courts as are afforded by it to its own citizens. In return foreigners must submit themselves to its laws and resort to its tribunals for the administration and enforcement of its laws. Certainly it is only fair and just that foreigners claiming rights under its laws should be required to litigate them in its own tribunals.

"Quite different is the case we have before us. Mexico owed no duty as a Government to the American people for her soldiers injured on American soil, and they owed Mexico no duty, except the duty to respect the rights of each other. In injuring these Americans, Mexico acted as a naked trespasser, and it outrages every sense of justice to be told that they must take their cases to the tribunals of the trespasser for trial, whether Mexican or American law is to be applied to the case.

"When the Secretary of State sent his communication and the brief of his solicitor to the committee in opposition to my resolution, and making the contention that these American claimants should submit their claims to Mexican tribunals, he did not express his views as to what laws should be applied to the case. I now ask him that question. Should Mexican laws be applied? If so, under what principle of international law or abstract justice should the laws of any foreign country be invoked to redress wrongs inflicted under American laws? Should American laws be applied? If so, let him point out just one authority holding that an American citizen should be required to leave his own country and go to the tribunals of a foreign country to have American law applied to a case which arose on American soil.

"Until the Secretary of State answers these questions he can not expect an acceptance of his naked statement that 'there was in international law no ground apparent to the department which would have justified it in discriminating between American claims or putting them in certain classes which should receive different treatment,' and that 'there was obviously no reason in abstract justice or in morals which required any such course.'

"I have examined with very great care the Secretary of State's communication and the brief of his solicitor and all the authorities cited by them, and I fail to find any authority for saying that all claims against Mexico growing out of the late revolution should be treated as a unity—that the claims arising on American soil should receive identically the same treatment as those arising in Mexico. I have also made an examination of many works on international law and I have found no such authority.

"The first authority cited by the solicitor is Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 6, page 656 et seq., which lays down the general rule that a claimant must exhaust his local remedies before invoking diplomatic assistance. To state the rule more elaborately the solicitor quotes from a letter written in 1834 to a claimant by Mr. McLane, Secretary of State, as follows:

"'Although a government is bound to protect its citizens, and see that their injuries are redressed where justice is plainly refused them by a foreign nation, yet this obligation always presupposes a resort in the first instance to the ordinary means of defense or reparation which are afforded by the laws of the country in which their rights are infringed, to which laws they have voluntarily subjected themselves by entering within the sphere of their operation and by which they must consent to abide.'

"The case referred to by Mr. McLane was one of tort committed on the claimant by a mob in Cuba, and of course the local remedies afforded by the laws of Cuba should have been resorted to first. It is not a case in which the injuries complained of had occurred within our country.

"Let us notice the requirements of this rule. What is meant by 'local remedies'? It means such remedies as are afforded by the laws of the country in which the rights of the claimants are infringed. In the cases embraced in my resolution it means the remedies provided by American laws, not Mexican, because the injuries occurred in America and not in Mexico.

"I have made an exhaustive examination of all the cases cited in Moore's Digest of International Law in support of the rule that claimants must exhaust their local remedies before invoking diplomatic assistance, and I have found that without a single exception they are cases in which the claimants were injured in the foreign countries and not at home.

"The Secretary of State says that 'the right of the Government of Mexico to establish a tribunal to hear the evidence presented by any and all claimants against the Mexican Government, in order that the Government might adjust such claims, is certainly too clear to call for extended argument.'

"In support of this proposition, which to my mind is quite fallacious when stated so broadly, the Secretary quotes from a letter of Thomas Jefferson, as Secretary of State, to our representative at Paris, under date of March 12, 1793, as follows:

"'We surely can not deny to any nation that right whereon our own Government is founded, that every one may govern itself according to whatever form it pleases, and change these forms at its own will, and that it may transact its business with foreign nations through whatever organ it thinks proper, whether king, convention, assembly, committee, president, or anything else it may choose. The will of the nation is the only thing essential to be regarded.'

"The Secretary of State also quotes from Mr. Webster to the same effect, and as a complement to these authorities the Secretary lays down the doctrine announced by Secretary Bayard on December 3, 1886, as follows:

"'It may, however, be rightfully maintained, as has frequently been done by both this Government and that of Great Britain, that when a sovereign rests his administration, so far as concerns claims against himself, primarily on his judiciary, and when such tribunals are open to aliens for redress, to them aliens claiming to be aggrieved should at first resort.'

"Of course, no one will dispute the proposition made by Jefferson and Webster, viz: That every Government has the right to choose its own form of government and to transact its business through whatever organ it may think proper. And no one will deny that, as a general rule, every Government has the right to require that all claims arising under its own laws shall be submitted to its own judiciary.

"But I do most emphatically deny that any Government has the right to require that the claims of foreigners, arising under the laws of another country and outside the jurisdiction of its own laws, shall be prosecuted in its own courts.

"If, under the authorities just referred to, Mexico can require Americans unlawfully injured by Mexican troops within American jurisdiction to seek redress in Mexican tribunals, then Mexico can require any controversy affecting her interest to be tried in her own tribunals, however much such controversy may affect the interests of foreign people or foreign Governments. The fallacy of such a proposition readily appears from a mere statement of it.

"The Secretary's letter cites a number of cases in support of his position other than those already referred to, but none of them are in point. The Marcy letter was with regard to an American claim arising in Peru. The Fish letter related to claims of aliens against the United States arising out of the Civil War within our own jurisdiction. The other two cases are equally as inapplicable. Not one of them involved the question under discussion, viz, whether or not an American unlawfully injured in his own country by a foreign power can be required to resort to the courts of the foreign power for redress.

"As I have already stated, I have been unable to find any case in international law holding the affirmative upon that proposition, and I do not believe any such case can be found.

"The question seems to have been raised but once with our State Department, and it was then decided positively and emphatically against the present contention of our Secretary of State. I refer to the case of the American schooner Daylight, of Bath, Me., which vessel, while at anchor outside of the bar near the harbor of Tampico, being then on her voyage from Key West, Fla., with a cargo of lumber for Tampico, was at night run into by the Mexican gunboat Independencia, the vessel and cargo becoming a total loss. The claim for damages was made to the minister of foreign affairs of Mexico, who contended that the claimant should bring suit in the Mexican courts. To this contention Secretary of State Frelinghuysen vigorously dissented, because the injury was done beyond the jurisdiction of Mexican dominion. In discussing the question Mr. Frelinghuysen, in his instructions to the American ambassador to Mexico, wrote as follows:

"'Upon a careful examination of these several propositions of the distinguished secretary for foreign relations of Mexico I find myself wholly unable to agree with him in the conclusion that the doctrine embraced in them can, with any legal propriety, be considered applicable to the case of the Daylight. In his note to you of the same date regarding the case of the Sidbury, a copy of which accompanies your 776, referring to this same jurisdictional contention, Mr. Fernandez says: "This opinion does not merely rest upon the principle that the courts are called upon to redress injuries which are suffered by the inhabitants of the country or those who are transiently therein, for the purpose for which they are established is to administer justice." Giving to this proposition the interpretation which it has received from all writers on public law, and hitherto accepted by all civilized Governments—that is, that the municipal civil laws can only be held applicable to and operative on the rights, property, and persons of the citizens of the country and foreigners who may be either permanently or temporarily residing in the country—I find no difficulty in acceding to it. This, however, is all that can be claimed for it—all, as it is believed, that is claimed for it by the governments of Christian nations—and all that is allowed to it by the uniform declaration of writers on public law. "Considered," says Halleck, "in an international point of view, either the thing or the person made the subject of the jurisdiction must be within the territory, for no sovereignty can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits so as to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions and every exertion of authority of its sort beyond its limits is a mere nullity and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunals."

"'The same doctrine is found stated in different forms of expression in Phillimore, in Wheaton, in Westlake, and in Woolsey. I am not aware that it has ever been questioned.

"'The owners of the Daylight were never residents of Mexico, either permanent or temporary. They are not known to have ever been in the country. The master of the vessel was not a resident of Mexico, either permanent or temporary, and was never in the country beyond the port at which his vessel might touch. At the time of the occurrence which gave rise to the claim the vessel could scarcely be said, with strict propriety, to have been in Mexican waters. She was anchored outside the bar, near the harbor of Tampico, in an exceptionally rough sea, at the close of a severe storm, which rendered it unsafe for her to attempt to cross the bar or enter the harbor. To insist that those claimants shall go from Maine to Tampico to seek redress in the Mexican tribunals for a grievous wrong suffered at the hands of a high officer of the navy of that Republic, and in such proceedings to be met by the evidence which the commander of the Independencia would readily be able to elicit from the ship's crew, would, in the estimation of this Government, be a practical denial of justice. The Mexican Government is conceived to be justly responsible to this for the act of that officer, and consequently the views put forth by Mr. Fernandez in behalf of his Government can not be accepted or acceded to by this.

"'Guided by the suggestions of my former instructions in regard to the matter, you will again, in the light of the observations made in this, bring the subject to the attention of the minister for foreign affairs, and you will say at the same time that the President hopes and expects that so just a claim as this is deemed to be will receive early consideration, followed by prompt and speedy adjustment at the hands of the Government of Mexico.'

"The doctrine announced by Mr. Frelinghuysen is so elemental that I venture the belief that it was never called in question by any Government before our present Secretary of State began to deal with these Mexican claims. Mexico did not call it in question in the Daylight case, but based her contention that the case should be tried in her courts upon the ground that the injury to the schooner occurred in Mexican waters and within the dominion of Mexican laws. America refused to require the claimants to go into the Mexican courts because of the belief that the injury occurred upon the high seas, outside the dominion of Mexico.

"But aside from the legal question involved, in regard to which I believe I have clearly shown the Secretary has taken an erroneous view, he makes an argument in justification of his action in treating alike all claims growing out of the Mexican insurrection, which is also unsound. The Secretary says:

"'The necessity of treating the situation as a unit is evident when one considers losses suffered in the ordinary track of war, for which, under the ordinary rules of international law the Government of Mexico would seem not to be responsible, and yet which were losses as real and severe as those for which compensation might be claimed. The commission being authorized to deal with all claims not only in accordance with the strict law, but with the equities which might be shown, it seemed most desirable that opportunity be given to present the track-of-war claims to the commission without the prejudice which would have resulted from withholding from the commission all claims legally sound.'

"In the first place, I take the position that no claim arising within American dominion can be classed as a track-of-war claim. As I said before, these people who were injured and the Mexican Government did not owe each other any duty except the duty of respecting each other's rights. Though prosecuting a war, both the Mexican Federal and insurgent troops were bound to respect the rights and safety of Americans on American soil, and to the extent they did not do so were unlawful invaders and naked trespassers. No authority can be found holding that the necessities of war can justify either the invasion of the dominion of a neutral power or the wronging and killing of the citizens of a neutral power. If the rights of residents must give way to the necessities of a war being carried on by a government under which they live, that is another matter. And I say that the Secretary of State fails utterly to state any good reason why the well-founded claims of resident Americans should be tied up with claims of residents of Mexico which may not be well founded. Why should resident American hazard their claims in Mexican tribunals just because such course might aid in collecting other claims with which they absolutely have no connection?

"Finally, the Secretary says that 'where an armed insurrection has gone beyond control of the parent government, such government is not, as a general rule, responsible for damages done to foreigners by the insurgents, and that a government is not responsible for the acts of its own soldiers resulting in such injuries as are due to the misfortunes of war, either internal strife or conflict between nations; nor responsible for the acts of soldiers committed in their private capacity—acts of pillage—without the order or presence of a commanding officer; and that the department felt that these principles might be found to operate unfavorably toward some American claims if they should be presented diplomatically or be submitted to an international claims commission.'

"I want to say the Secretary need not have any apprehension that either of these principles could be invoked against any of the claims we are dealing with. It matters not whether the injuries were inflicted by the Federal or insurgent troops. If by the former, of course the Mexican Government would be liable, and if by the latter the Government would be liable because the insurrection was successful, and under well-established rules of international law the Government in the hands of the insurrectionists would be liable. (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. VI, p. 901.)

"As I have already shown, the 'misfortunes-of-war' doctrine can not properly apply to nonresident foreign neutrals. And certainly it can not be claimed that in injuring our people the Mexican troops were acting in their private capacity, without the order or presence of a commanding officer. They were in the immediate command of their officers, and engaged in a struggle for the control of the Mexican Government. At El Paso the insurgent forces were under the personal command of Madero, who is now the President of Mexico.

"With regard to the suggestion that the Mexican Government has changed its position so far as to now say it would authorize the Mexican consuls at El Paso and Douglas to make investigations of all the claims of American citizens at those places and endeavor to make direct settlement with claimants, I desire to say that such suggestion is entirely unsatisfactory to claimants. It will be noted that as a part of the proposal it is stated that in the event of failure to reach settlement the cases would be remanded to the Mexican consultative claims commission. The claimants believe this change in attitude on the part of the Mexican Government is only a ruse in line with its past conduct to bring about delay and the ultimate defeat of the claims.

"Moreover, in this change of attitude the Mexican Government still adheres to its claim of right to try these cases before its own tribunals—a proposition so contrary to international law and all sense of justice that claimants can not assent to it.

"I want to remind the committee that there is involved in this matter not alone the question of making compensation to a few American claimants. It presents for solution a great question of international law which concerns every American citizen, and unless settled right, may in the future subject many American citizens to outrages and injuries for which they would be unable to obtain any redress.

"I also cite the following authorities in support of the rights of aliens in the United States:

"'Aliens coming within our territory are entitled to the same protection in their personal rights as our own citizens, and no more.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 2.)

"'There is no principle of the law of nations more firmly established than that which entitles the property of strangers within the jurisdiction of a country in friendship with their own to the protection of its sovereign by all the efforts in his power. This common rule of intercourse between all civilized nations has between the United States and Spain the further and solemn sanction of all express stipulation by treaty. In violation both of the common usage of nations and of the express promise of Spain in the treaty, nearly 200 vessels and their cargoes, belonging to citizens of the United States, were seized, many of them within the territorial limits of Spain and under the cannon of her fortresses, by French cruisers, and all of them were condemned within Spanish jurisdiction. Spain was required to pay indemnity.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 5.)

"'The policy of the United States in all cases of complaints mode by foreigners is to extend to them the same means of redress as is enjoyed by our own citizens.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 7.)

"'In the courts of the United States alien friends are entitled to claim the same protection of their rights as citizens.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 7.)

"'Aliens domiciled in the United States owe to the Government a local and temporary allegiance, which continues during the period of their residence, and for the violation of which they may become liable to prosecution for treason, just as a citizen.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 10.)

"'The authority which every sovereign has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction makes him responsible to others for their conduct as much and for the same reason as he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects.'" (Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. IV, p. 11.)

"It would seem to me that according to the authority I have cited with reference to the seizure of American ships by France in Spanish waters, the United States would be liable for damages for injury to aliens within our dominion by Mexico, and therefore it would follow that the United States would be entitled, in turn, to recover the damages from Mexico.

"See Koszta case, Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 3, page 820, for elaborate discussion of the rights and duties of the United States with regard to aliens domiciled within its territory.

"Also, see letter of B. Bryan to Mr. Huntington Wilson, Acting Secretary of State, on same subject, which follows:"

SEPTEMBER 11, 1911.

Mr. HUNTINGTON WILSON,
Acting Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of date August 26, 1911, to Hon. W. R. SMITH, Member of Congress from Texas, in regard to claims against Mexico of Richard Brown, Virginia Moorhead, and Francisco Portillo, which letter has been transmitted to me by Mr. SMITH. In said letter you used the following language: "The Department of State would not be warranted in making any representations in regard to the claim of Francisco Portillo, as it appears from his memorial that he is not an American citizen." I respectfully differ from you in the conclusion that the memorial of Francisco Portillo does not show that he is an American citizen and entitled to protection as such. My authority, I refer you to Moore on International Arbitration, Digest, volume 3, and the case of Jarr and Hearst, pages 2707, 2708, 2710, 2711, 2712, 2713. In these cases continuous domicile in the United States along with the declaration of intention to become a citizen permitted the claimants to appear before the commissioner and claim damages. After full discussion, Mr. Palacio, the Mexican commissioner, who at first denied the right, ultimately conceded that such persons were citizens of the United States. Also, I cite you, same authority, Moore's Digest International Arbitration, volume 3, page 2722, to the argument of Mr. Hale, counsel for the United States, in which he goes exhaustively into the question of domicile and intention to become a citizen and the protection flowing therefrom. In same case I cite you also to the argument of Judge E. R. Hoar, in which argument Judge Hoar exhaustively discusses the rights of one permanently domiciled in the country, as is shown to be the case in the case of Francisco Portillo.

Also, I cite you to the distinction between national character of property and the nationality of persons, to wit, act of Congress, 1868; and Phillimore, International Law, part 5, cap. 1.

In the above cases the commission between Mexico and the United States allowed the parties to appear as complainants for damage and allowed damages.

I respectfully ask what is the difference between the case made out in Francisco Portillo's memorial and the parties above referred to? Portillo's memorial shows that he came to reside in the city of El Paso, State of Texas, United States of America, in the year 1893, and that he has continuously since that date resided in the city of El Paso, State of Texas, United States of America; second, that he made his declaration of becoming a citizen in the year 1896; third, that acting upon said declaration he has been exercising his right as a voter in the city of El Paso, State of Texas, United States of America, in all elections, local, district, State, and National; fourth, that he has acquired property in the city of El Paso, Tex., and is a taxpayer and as such is a merchant engaged in business; fifth, that his children have been educated in the public schools of El Paso, Tex.; sixth, he is a man of family and has continuously resided in El Paso, Tex., never returning to Mexico; seventh, that he has taken all necessary steps to take out his final paper of citizenship.

As said by Mr. Ashton in his argument, Moore's Digest, volume 3, page 2703 (and his argument was sustained by the commission and the claimant allowed damages), that the naturalization of an alien relates back in the first step and constitutes him a citizen from the date of declaration of intention; "that persons who have duly declared their intention to become citizens of and bona fide domicile of the United States are subject to the protection of the United States against injuries by the territory of Mexico within and without the territory of the United States."

I repeat that this theory of Mr. Ashton was adopted by the commission on Mexican claims. It has been adopted, as I understand, from the books on international law, Moore's Digest, in the matter of adjustment of claims between Great Britain and the United States.

Also, I respectfully call your attention to the laws of Mexico on the subject of expatriation of Mexican citizens, to wit: In substance, that where a Mexican shall remove from Mexico to the United States or other foreign country and shall not make his declaration of remaining a citizen of Mexico within three years after his "domicile in said foreign country that said Mexican citizen shall be considered a citizen of said country where he is domiciled." Francisco Portillo, memorialist, shows that he has been continuously a citizen of El Paso, Tex., United States of America.

I respectfully submit, in view of the facts stated in the memorial of Francisco Portillo and of the foregoing authorities quoted, that the memorial of said Portillo should be by the Department of State duly received and presented to the Mexican Government.

Yours, truly,

B. BRYAN.

The foregoing letter of B. Bryan and the authorities cited by Mr. SMITH upon the rights of aliens domiciled in a foreign country are for the purpose of establishing the right of the United States to demand compensation for aliens domiciled in the United States and who were injured within the United States by Mexican troops firing across the international boundary line.

Answering the foregoing argument of Representative SMITH, it is contended in behalf of the State Department—

"That there would appear to be few, if any, of the essential points of this matter which have not already been covered by the department. However, for the purpose of recalling distinctly the precise circumstances of this case, it may be well to recapitulate them, as follows:

"In two contests between the forces of the established Government of Mexico and the insurrectionists at and around points lying on the Mexican side of our southern border, shots were fired into American territory with a result that a number of persons were injured and some killed, most of whom were American citizens. It will be at once perceived that this action by the Mexican forces constituted a violation of our territory, as well as an injury to our citizens. While this department has not yet reached a definite conclusion regarding the first element named—that is, the violation of territory—it is probable that inasmuch as there is the strongest reason to believe that no affront to this Government or its people was intended by the action of the Mexican forces, no action will be taken with reference to this matter, since, if the situation were reversed, it is probable that this Government might consider itself under the necessity of doing just as the Mexican Government did, even though such action might result in injury on the Mexican side of the border.

"With reference to the injury inflicted upon persons within our own territory the department has called these claims to the attention of the Mexican Government and has insisted that they should be settled. The Mexican Government, having established an administrative body known as the Consultative Claims Commission, for the examination of all claims against the Mexican Government arising out of the revolution, the claimants were referred to this commission. Since this reference the department has again taken the matter up with the Mexican Government and has secured from that Government the promise that it will attempt at an early date to reach a direct settlement with the claimants through the Mexican consuls located at El Paso, Tex., and Douglas, Ariz. While it would appear that as yet the consuls have not settled these claims, the conditions existing in Mexico are such as entirely to account for this delay, so that it need not be charged to a mere disposition to put off settlement. The department has received every assurance and has the strongest reason to believe that the Mexican Government will settle the claims as soon as practicable.

"In presenting the claims to the Mexican Government, this Government has in each case reserved the right to take them up diplomatically should the offer of settlement made by the Mexican Government appear to this Government inadequate. This course has appeared to it the due and proper one considering all the principles involved, and in following this procedure the department has extended only such courtesies and has recognized only such rights as in a reciprocal case it would expect and demand upon its own part. The course thus far pursued has followed the usual amenities and courtesies observed between sovereign powers. The course thus far followed has not only protected the ultimate rights of the injured persons, but it has perfected their rights by giving to the Government of Mexico every opportunity itself to adjust these claims. This is a matter of most vital importance if Mexico should fail to make or offer such a settlement of the cases as would accord with this Government's view of the equities involved and we should later be forced to go to arbitration.

"Mr. SMITH appears to complain of this course and to desire that this Government, at its own expense, investigate these cases, prepare them, and in the first instance present them diplomatically and formally with a demand for payment. The course to be followed after the making of this demand in case Mexico did not, as it probably would not, at once accede to the same, Mr. SMITH does not appear to outline. It is probable, however, that he would grant to Mexico the right to make an investigation and a counter offer should that Government not consider the American demand as just and equitable. It will be observed that this would merely bring the negotiations to the same point in which they will be when Mexico has made an offer of settlement, as a result of its initial investigations, and this Government has passed upon the adequacy of such offer. Waiving for the present all legal considerations in the matter of preference between the course followed by the department and the course which Mr. SMITH desires, it is quite clear that, as a matter of policy and consideration, the course adopted by this department is calculated to arouse less hostility toward these claims, and therefore probably secure for them a more generous treatment than would result from the unusual procedure advocated by Mr. SMITH.

"With reference to the contentions of Mr. SMITH as to the legal principles involved in this case, it should be observed that even assuming the rules for which he contends are well founded, it is quite clear that the department has as yet taken no action which sacrifices American citizens or their rights or which surrenders on the part of the Government itself any right or principle. This department being charged with the conduct of our foreign affairs, including the protection of American citizens with reference to injuries inflicted upon them by other Governments, is quite as zealous as any individual could be in exercising all and every care that our rights are fully and amply recognized and protected, and this department has to consider, in the exercise of these functions of protection, not only the injuries inflicted upon any particular individual or set of individuals, but upon American citizens generally, and the department would be open to the gravest censure did it sacrifice the interests of the many for the benefit of any given few. However, the discussion between this Government and Mexico regarding these claims has not yet reached the stage where it would appear the legal questions raised by Mr. SMITH have become involved. The discussion will have reached that stage when the Government of Mexico has investigated, not judicially, but administratively as it is now doing, and has made an offer; when this Government has considered and declined (if this shall be the course followed) the offer made by Mexico; and when Mexico has then attempted (if it shall so do) to refer these claimants to the Mexican courts. Then the question as to what law shall control and in what forum the extent of liability shall be determined will arise. But at the present time these questions are not involved, since the Mexican Government is now making, as it has a right to do, an administrative investigation into the facts and circumstances of the cases with a view to making a settlement directly with the claimants. It is difficult to see how Mexico could do more or upon what grounds we could ask more than this.

"In this connection Mr. SMITH, in the brief which he filed before your committee (a copy of which he was good enough to leave informally with the solicitor for this department), has placed great and indeed seemingly sole reliance for his position upon the case of the Daylight against Mexico, and particularly upon an instruction sent by Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State for President Arthur, to the American minister at Mexico City under date of May 17, 1884. (Foreign Relations, 1884, p. 358.) It may be of interest to you to observe that in that case, notwithstanding Mr. Frelinghuysen's statement arguendo in the instruction above cited, the Mexican Government persisted in its contention and referred the matter for investigation to the Mexican department of war and marine, which reported adversely upon the case, and Mexico declined to pay an indemnity. The position of the Mexican Government seems to have been accepted by Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State for President Cleveland, and apparently nothing ever came of the matter.

"Without wishing to be regarded as expressing or as indicating at this time a definite opinion upon the arguments advanced by Mr. Smith on this matter—concerning as they do questions which in the judgment of the department are not now before the department—it may be permitted, in connection with the reliance which he places upon the arguments of Mr. Frelinghuysen for the department, to call to your attention the statement by Mr. Moore in his preface to his International Law Digest that in considering questions of international import "two points of capital importance" must ever be borne in mind. He says:

"'One is that mere extracts from State papers or judicial decisions can not be safely relied on as guides to the law. They may indeed be positively misleading. Especially is this true of State papers, in which arguments are often contentiously put forth which by no means represent the eventual view of the Government in whose behalf they were employed. Instead, therefore, of merely quoting extracts from particular documents, it has been my aim to give the history of the cases in which they were issued, and, by showing what was finally done, to disclose the opinion that in the end prevailed.'"

"In this connection the department may refer to the notation made by Mr. Moore regarding this case in volume 6 (p. 679) of his digest, in which he states, after quoting the very language upon which Mr. Smith relies, that 'the Mexican Government adhered to its position.'

"The department wishes, however, to assure you that in thus putting this matter before you it has no other thought than to indicate to you that there appears to be no present necessity for any such action as is proposed. The department desires also that you should be firmly convinced that this department has done and will continue to do everything in its power to protect American citizens and to secure redress for those who suffer injuries, including the very unfortunate sufferers at El Paso and Douglas.

"As a matter of fact it appears that the only practical result which would follow the enactment of the joint resolution proposed would be that this Government would be charged with the responsibility and the expense of the initial preparation of the claims of the injured persons at El Paso, Tex., and Douglas, Ariz., instead of having these persons prepare their own claims and meet the expense thereof as is the uniform and invariable rule, so far as the department is advised, in such cases. No reason is perceived why these claims should not in this particular respect take the course usual in such cases.

"While the following considerations are not immediately before the department for its comment at this time, it calls them to your attention in the thought that perhaps in view of them and entirely aside from the discussion which has preceded you may think it unwise to attempt the passage of the present resolution.

"In the first place, the resolution purports to direct the Secretary of State in the performance of a purely executive function, and in the exercise of a purely executive discretion, a course which in the past has not been found to affect the obligations of the Executive in the premises, as was seen in the case of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Co.

"In the next place, the resolution purports to give a commission certain judicial powers in the matter of compelling the attendance of witnesses, etc. In view of decisions of the Supreme Court on this point you will doubtless consider it a matter of very grave doubt as to whether or not the powers which the resolution would seek to confer would actually be enjoyed by the commission contemplated.

"Finally, while the Secretary is thus 'authorized and directed' to make certain investigations, the resolution carries no appropriation to meet the expenses of such investigation. In view of the circumstances of this case it is my judgment that there is no fund at its disposition which the department would regard as appropriately expendable for this purpose.

"The department ventures to suggest that as the department is already doing in this matter all that it properly may as between this Government and Mexico, the continued exercise by those who are suggesting this legislation of the patience which they have hitherto shown will not only result in no prejudice to the interests which they represent, but will really facilitate the department's disposition of the cases."

The committee, after very careful consideration, is of the opinion that there is no principle of international law requiring, and that it would be an act of injustice to require, these claimants who were thus injured through no fault of their own, within their own country, within the dominion of their own laws, to go to a foreign country for the trial of their cases before a foreign tribunal. It is the opinion of the committee that the rule which would require foreigners injured in Mexico to exhaust their local remedies—that is, to first submit their claims to such tribunals as may be provided by the Mexican Government—is wholly inapplicable to these claimants. In the former cases the rights of the claimants and the measure of their damages would have to be determined by Mexican laws within the dominion of which the injuries occurred. In the latter cases American laws should be applied. It is essential that Mexican laws should be applied by Mexican tribunals, and it is equally as essential that American laws should be applied by American tribunals. Mexican tribunals are not supposed to be competent to construe and administer American laws any more than American tribunals are to construe and administer Mexican laws.

Moreover, it is always reasonable to assume that in cases of tort the evidence necessary to a full development of the case and to a complete administration of justice must be produced from the place of the tort. Therefore in case of tort committed in Mexico the tribunals in that country could enforce the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence; but in cases where the torts are committed in the United States the Mexican tribunals can not enforce the production of evidence.

It seems to be the contention of the State Department that it is not insisting upon the trial of these cases in Mexico; that it is only suggesting a kind of negotiation as a matter of courtesy to Mexico, out of which it hopes a satisfactory settlement may be reached. In reply to this it may be said that there can be no intelligent negotiation in regard to these claims without some legal standard to apply to them. If the claims had arisen in Mexico, the Mexican Government could apply the Mexican legal standards, but having arisen in the United States the standard should be the laws of this country, and it can not be applied except by some agency of this Government.

Moreover, it is the opinion of the committee that one of the highest duties of a government to its citizens, in cases where they suffer wrongs, is to afford them a means of redress by which they may obtain justice. This our Government fails to do when it sends its citizens abroad to negotiate for justice with the agents of a foreign Government. Therefore we believe it to be the duty of our Government to provide some agency to make a full investigation of these claims, determine the amounts due, and present and press them for payment as diplomatic claims. This should be done as the initial step, and this is the purpose of this resolution.

Since the introduction of this resolution in the House the Mexican Government has advised our State Department that it has referred the matter of the adjustment of these claims to the Mexican consuls at El Paso and at Nogales, and within the last few days that it has appointed commissioners at El Paso to attend to these claims. Further than this nothing has been done, although nearly a year has elapsed since these claims arose. In the opinion of the committee none of these proposed methods of dealing with these claimants meets the just demands of the claimants that our Government shall determine the claims and assume the burden of presenting them to Mexico through diplomatic channels for payment, and that they be not required to submit them to Mexico for adjudication.

Our State Departments suggests that—

"The resolution purports to direct the Secretary of State in the performance of a purely executive function and in the exercise of a purely executive discretion—a course which in the past has not been found to affect the obligations of the executive in the premises, as was seen in the case of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Co."

The case referred to was a case where the claimant, the Venezuela Steam Transportation Co., was denied damages by Venezuela for injuries occurring in that country because it had chosen to present its claim through diplomatic channels instead of to "the high federal court," as required by the law of Venezuela. Our State Department very properly took the position it would not be bound by any such law. But we take it that while an act of the Venezuela Congress "would not affect the obligations" of the Secretary of State, an act of the Congress of the United States may do so, as the State Department was created and its duties defined by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FALL. But the Secretary says, and I want to call the particular attention of the Senate to this portion of the report:

Following these occurrences the Americans who were thus injured, and the legal representatives of those who were killed, prepared their claims against the Mexican Government for damages and presented them to our Secretary of State, together with their proof, with the request that the Secretary present them to the Mexican Government.

These are the claims now under consideration.

This the Secretary refused to do, and instead advised the claimants that the American embassy at the City of Mexico would, upon specific request of claimants, file their claims with the Mexican foreign office for presentation to the consulative claims commission of Mexico, but with the distinct understanding that in so presenting the claims to the Mexican foreign office neither the embassy nor the Government of the United States would pass upon the propriety, equity, justice, or legality of such claims, and that these questions would be left for further consideration and final determination in accordance with the rules and principles of international law.

That he would not present the claims as a diplomatic matter he himself says; that he would not take them up diplomatically even with a foreign government, but simply allow them to be forwarded through the American ambassador, and through courtesy he would turn them over to the Mexican authorities.

This is too long to read; but, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of Senators of the United States to a matter which the State Department has taken up diplomatically.

Now, remember American citizens were killed on this side of the river by rebels and federals shooting across from the other side, and our State Department refuses absolutely to take up those claims and to demand or to assist in securing their payment.

But a short time since——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does not the report of the Secretary of State with respect to the killing of these citizens who were killed on American soil relegate them to the tribunals of Mexico and suggest that Congress has no jurisdiction?

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Declaring that they are citizens over there, and to let them see what mercy they will be given over there, and that we will not interfere on this side until they do it.

Mr. FALL. Entirely. He says, among other things, that the claims of some of them have been sent to the Mexican consul at El Paso, Tex., and that the claimants can proceed to the Mexican consul and give in their evidence there, and then let him send it down to Mexico and have it passed on, but that the United States Government will not interfere with it. It has interfered in only one claim, and that is the only claim which has been paid. And that was not the interference of the United States, but the assistant district attorney for the western district of Texas, who represented one of these claimants, and he secured a payment of $4,000. No publicity was given to it. What the consideration was, I can not say, except that he was doing business for the Mexican consul, in arresting American or Mexican citizens and assisting in holding them in jail in El Paso, Tex., for 40 days on our soil.

Mr. President, the document which I hold in my hand is the most remarkable one, in view of the one I have just had printed, ever produced from any State Department or any department of foreign affairs.

A short time since, Mr. President, with these claims pending and in the face of the refusal of the State Department to take up or to consider or even to present through diplomatic channels American claims for damages, a gentleman came here from one of the Southwestern States and secured certain assistance in making representations to the State Department that the States of New Mexico and Arizona and Texas had, respectively, passed laws providing rewards for the killing of wild animals on this side of the line—bears and coyotes—which animals were sometimes injurious to stock. These representations were made to the State Department of the United States upon the theory that unless Mexico passed some similar laws such animals would come across the border from the Republic of Mexico into the United States; that jack rabbits would destroy the apple trees planted by American citizens on this side, and that coyotes would catch American sheep; and while the department refused to take up through diplomatic channels the claims for the death of American citizens on this side, I hold here copies of the correspondence between the State Department and the Mexican Government which shows that the State Department does represent diplomatically to the Government of Mexico that something should be done by that Government for the enactment of such laws as we have enacted, and which would prevent jack rabbits and coyotes from the Mexican side interfering with the horticultural and stock interest on the American side.

So much importance was given to this matter, Senators, that the Mexican ambassador himself was called into our State Department, and representations were made by our State Department directly to the Mexican ambassador here, and official communications through diplomatic channels went to the foreign department of the Mexican Government. We could take up claims for injuries by jack rabbits and coyotes to fruit trees and sheep, but an American citizen was not worthy of diplomatic consideration. His life amounted to nothing. The owner of the tree might be killed by a Mexican bullet while working around the tree on this side, but a Mexican jack rabbit must not come across and bite the tree.

Mr. President, lives have been lost and millions of dollars of American property have been destroyed within the Republic of Mexico. These claims refer only to matters which have arisen on the outside, within our own territory. This resolution goes only that far, and it does not go far enough.

I frankly admit that with reference to injuries resulting to our citizens within the Republic of Mexico, if they have a government, under international law our citizens might properly be referred to the local courts first, before the United States Government takes up their claims. But even then it would be the duty of the United States Government first to see that there was a proper court, and that the claims were properly presented or forwarded to that court and reached them, through diplomatic channels if necessary.

I happen to have personal knowledge of exactly what has resulted from the attempt of our State Department to relegate American citizens living in Mexico to the local tribunals for relief. In one case, sir, for four months a Madero general camped upon a cattle range belonging to an American citizen living in Mexico. For four months before the battle of Agua Prieta his soldiers subsisted upon the beef upon that range. Finally, when Madero's government was recognized, this American citizen wrote on to the State Department, filing a claim, and asking that it might be taken up against the Mexican Government in some way. He was answered by the State Department—very properly if there had been a Mexican Government—that he must first exhaust his remedy in the local tribunal.

The day he received that answer he was called up before the court of the insurgent commander in charge of the Government at this particular locality. With a laugh, the insurgent commander handed him a copy of the note from the State Department, and handed him his original claim, which had come from Mexico with this notation, and showed him his instructions from the Mexican Foreign Office to settle this claim himself.

Who was this insurgent commander? He was the man who had killed the stock and eaten them. He was the man who had committed the depredation. He was the man who had stolen the cattle. He was the man who had driven the cattle off the range. This was the man who was called upon by our Government and the Mexican Government to pass upon the claim.

The American citizen knew what that meant. The general was there with two or three hundred armed men around him. When the Mexican commander laughed and said:

Now, what have you to say about this claim?

His answer:

Why, just whatever you say. If you think you ate any of my cattle, and they are worth paying for, I should be glad to have you pay for them. If you do not, all right; you can have them.

I think the Mexican commander finally admitted that about 500 men, in the course of four months, living entirely upon beef—for that is all they had to eat—might possibly have eaten as many as 20 of the beeves, and that he would give him a receipt for that number; and, although the American citizen claimed that 3,000 head of his cattle had been destroyed, he gratefully took the receipt, and his estate has not yet been able to collect the money.

We are relegated back to the very people in Mexico who have committed these depredations. Madero is supposed to be the Mexican Government. When you send claims for damages down to Mexico now, you send them to Madero. He and his militia officers or volunteer officers or regular officers pass upon these claims. They do not go into the courts. They pass upon them themselves, as administrative officers, and reject them or pay them as they please; and they have never paid one.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not sure I correctly understood the Senator. Do I understand that when it was represented to the State Department that American citizens had been injured in Mexico during a state of war, and by reason thereof, the State Department replied that the injured parties would have to first submit their cases to local tribunals before the National Government would interfere?

Mr. FALL. Before our Government would interfere—oh, yes; yes, sir. Not only that, but we are told that the claims of the descendants of American citizens killed on this side of the line by Mexicans on the other side can not be submitted to our own courts. We are told that this Government will not take them up; it will not pay them itself, and it will not demand that the Mexican Government pay them, but that we must take before the Mexican local tribunal even a claim for damages sustained on this side of the line.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there any precedent for such action?

Mr. FALL. There is none in international law.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it claimed that there is anything in the treaties between the two countries which would require that?

Mr. FALL. No. I do not expect the Senator to read all my remarks in the RECORD, but if he will read the documents which I have asked to have printed, or even this report from the House committee, he will see there set forth the reasons given by the State Department for not even taking up or submitting diplomatically these questions. And those reasons are absolutely contradicted by every decision not only of our own State Department but of every other civilized country on earth.

Mr. SWANSON. Is this something written by the Secretary of State or the Assistant Secretary of State?

Mr. FALL. It purports to be the Secretary of State himself.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But that does not make any difference so far as our citizens are concerned.

Mr. FALL. No; so far as the injuries to our citizens are concerned, it does not make any difference. If the Senator will alow me to guess, in view of the great reputation the Secretary of State of the United States has borne as a lawyer, I would suppose that possibly these communications, and even this official protest from the State Department to the Congress of the United States, had been written by some attaché of the office who had never studied law. Therefore I hesitated somewhat, Mr. President, to vote against the appropriation to furnish law books to all the executive officers of the different departments.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber during a portion of the remarks of the Senator. I understand the Senator has called attention to the attitude taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations as to injuries received by American citizens on American soil. Am I correct in that?

Mr. FALL. I have not directly done so. I have inferentially; but I am going to do so directly before I close my remarks.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. FALL. At present I want to call the attention of the Senate of the United States to the different course pursued by at least two other Governments in the matter of collecting or having established their claims for damages for injuries resulting to their citizens entirely within the Republic of Mexico.

We have read with some interest recently of the establishment of a Republic in China. In Mexico, Senators, under present conditions I would prefer to be a citizen of the Republic of China rather than of this great Nation of which some of us are so proud.

Our Government has refused not only to protect our citizens, has refused to take up their claims for damages diplomatically, but has refused to take them up at all. Millions of dollars of our property has been destroyed and hundreds of lives of American citizens have been lost in Mexico. China has adjusted claims for exactly the same damages to her citizens in the Republic of Mexico to the amount of ₱3,000,000, $1,500,000 in gold. I will read a translation of a telegram from Berlin of May 20:

> The Government of Mexico has paid over to that of Germany the sum of $100,000 as damages for the surviving relatives of the four Germans who were murdered in July of last year in Pueblo, Mexico, during a riot in the Corvadonga factory.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit an interruption, at what time did that occur as compared with the outrage of which he speaks against United States citizens?

Mr. FALL. This was July of last year. The outrage in the killing of our citizens in El Paso took place in May, those in Douglas in April, and then different matters, murders, and so forth, which have gone unpunished to which I have referred specifically, ran along in the different States up to the 2d day of July of this year. In the meantime for damages of exactly the same character even the bankrupt Government of the Republic of China has been able diplomatically to take up the claims of their citizens and have them adjusted. Germany has taken up the claims of her citizens and has had them paid. The United States Government to this good day has absolutely refused even to forward through diplomatic channels a claim of an American citizen.

I wish to refer briefly, Mr. President, to the conditions which exist as to our acts affecting the minds of the Mexican people to-day. I say it to you, sir, without fear of contradiction, in the face of publications such as we see in one of the papers this morning from two American citizens claiming to be from the City of Mexico and undertaking to state conditions there. I want to say to the Senators of the United States in all seriousness that in my judgment the action of our Government in Mexican matters has put the American people in so far as their interests are concerned and in so far as the personal feeling of the Mexican people toward Americans is concerned where it will require 50 years at least of the most diplomatic management upon our part to restore us to one-half the confidence in their minds which we had up to the time the President of the United States issued the proclamation to which I propose to refer.

Mr. President, the State of Chihuahua has been for several months past and until within the last few days, and the greater portion of it now is, in the hands of those who are in arms against the Madero government, in the hands of Pascuel Orozco, who is the same man who put Madero in power as against Diaz. During this time the railroads have been kept running, communication has been unbroken, the customhouses on the border have been open, free intercourse between the people of the two countries has been carried on, mines owned by Americans in the State of Chihuahua have been protected, and work has been continued in them under Orozco's government.

He has been collecting taxes, and has been at least a de facto governor or supreme power in one of the great States of the Mexican so-called Republic. We, as a Nation and individually, have had constant dealings with him during this entire time, but we have dealt with him as a man and even a de facto official in an entirely different manner from that in which we have dealt with the Mexicans of the other States, which have not been in open revolution against the so-called Madero government.

I want to call the attention of Senators now to the fact that time will prove, and very soon, in my opinion, you will discover it, that in the States such as Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas and Coahuila, which are not in open revolt against the Mexican Government, the Mexican Government can obtain no assistance whatsoever from its citizens, and that there is an armed neutrality between certain high officials of those States and the Mexican Government. They are not fully in accord with the so-called Government to-day.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that some time since a resolution was adopted, on March 14, 1912. The Congress of the United States, having had reported to it, I suppose, something of the conditions going on in Mexico and possibly in other countries, adopted a resolution to this effect:

> That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions—

In any American, not some foreign country or country across the water, but in the American countries—those on this hemisphere—

> That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Mr. President, that resolution was certainly an absolutely proper step for the Congress of the United States to take. It was certainly proper that we should say that the President should have the power to suspend the exportation of arms and munitions of war to one of our neighboring States which was in a state of revolution or domestic violence, as the language of the resolution reads.

But the people of northern Mexico—the people of Sonora and Chihuahua particularly—are those with whom the Americans come directly in contact. Those are the people with whom we first deal in going down to Mexico generally, because now the greater portion of the business goes through El Paso or New Mexico and Arizona into old Mexico. Not so great a portion of it goes through Laredo or Del Rio. The Mexican people of Chihuahua and Sonora particularly are those with whom we come most closely in contact, and with whom we must deal.

Now, what has been done by the Government of the United States in carrying out that resolution? Not one cartridge or not one gun has been allowed to be exported through the customhouse at Juarez, or at any of the other customhouses which were in the hands of the de facto authorities of northern Mexico—not one rifle; not one cartridge. Against that alone those Mexicans would have had no just cause of complaint, but they know that under absolute direct license arms and munitions of war have been carried to the Mexican soldiers in the field from the ports of the United States by the permission of the administration. They do know that munitions of war have been carried down there by permits directly issued, and that their enemies have been furnished with them.

Where is Villa, this man whom Huerta speaks of as having looted the city of Parral and stolen over $200,000? He is in Madero's service. Where did he get his machine guns? Where did he obtain the machine gun for the working or firing of which Fountain was stood up against the wall and shot to death? It came through American ports.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. THORNTON. Will the Senator from New Mexico tell me that he recognizes no difference between the fact of this Government permitting a friendly power like the regularly organized Government of Mexico with which we have diplomatic relations to import arms and a rebel government with which we have no diplomatic relations, but who are engaged in trying to overturn the regular government which we do recognize, and with which we have diplomatic relations?

Mr. FALL. I do recognize the difference. The Senator is absolutely right that we should recognize the difference in dealing with a fully constituted government on the one hand and with insurrectos or revoltosos as the Mexicans call themselves, who are in revolution against that government, on the other.

I also recognize the fact that at times it is necessary to recognize a defacto government such as Orozco has had for five months in the State of Chihuahua. We recognized Orozco's government to the extent of carrying on with him all other kinds or character of business through the customhouse, the regular customhouse of the Mexican Government in his charge. We pay him duties upon everything taken into Old Mexico except that we would not allow him to get arms or ammunition through that customhouse.

The Senator did not catch exactly the point that I was making. I am now speaking of the impression made upon the minds of the people of Mexico, three-fourths of whom I think are opposed to the so-called Madero government. I speak of the impression made upon their minds by this discrimination.

The Senator will certainly admit it is a matter of judgment at any rate upon the part of the United States as to whether under this resolution discrimination shall be made and which does not permit directly the exception to be made. As I understand it, certainly it is a matter of judgment as to whether the President of the United States would permit the exportation of arms for the Madero government and exclude it to that of the Orozco government.

The proclamation of the President issued upon this resolution is not simply commanding the people of the United States to observe this neutrality law and not to export arms to either party engaged in the domestic trouble; it is a general proclamation that there is trouble in Mexico, and that all citizens of the United States must preserve neutrality and must not export arms under this resolution, not confining the prohibition simply to arms, and so forth, for the insurgents or to the insurrectos, but prohibiting generally the exportation of arms, ammunition, and munitions through our customhouse across the river for the benefit of one side as well as the other.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Does not that resolution limit the prohibition to cases in which the export takes place for the promotion of domestic violence?

Mr. FALL. I think that was possibly the intention, but I do not think——

Mr. LODGE. I think that is the wording of it. As I remember it, it is where the munitions of war are sent for the purpose of promoting domestic violence. Of course the forces of the recognized government can hardly be legally described as promoting domestic violence. They might do that, but they can not be described so in the contemplation of law.

Mr. FALL. I understand that diplomatically they can not. We are great sticklers for diplomacy in our country. The proclamation by the President of the United States is as follows:

EXPORT OF ARMS, ETC., TO MEXICO.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a joint resolution of Congress, approved March 14, 1912, reads and provides as follows: "That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress"; and

Whereas it is provided by section 2 of the said joint resolution "that any shipment of material hereby declared unlawful after such a proclamation shall be punishable by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both":

Now, therefore, I, William Howard Taft, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority conferred in me by the said joint resolution of Congress, do hereby declare and proclaim that I have found that there exist in Mexico such conditions of domestic violence promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States as contemplated by the said joint resolution; and I do hereby admonish all citizens of the United States and every person to abstain from every violation of the provisions of the joint resolution above set forth, hereby made applicable to Mexico, and I do hereby warn them that all violations of such provisions will be rigorously prosecuted. And I do hereby enjoin upon all officers of the United States charged with the execution of the laws thereof the utmost diligence in preventing violations of the said joint resolution and this my proclamation issued thereunder, and in bringing to trial and punishment any offenders against the same.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 14th day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-sixth.

[SEAL.] WM. H. TAFT.

By the President:

HUNTINGTON WILSON,
Acting Secretary of State.

[No. 1185.]

The point that I was making, I will explain to the Senator from Massachusetts, was that under this proclamation at least the majority of Mexican citizens construed it to mean that the exportation of arms and munitions was prohibited to Mexico, not that such exportation was allowed as to those who were pretending even temporarily to support the constituted Government, but prohibited to those like Orozco, who have not supported the present constituted Government, although they were de facto officials in full and complete control of one of the States of the union.

Now, why should it make this impression upon them? Because Mr. Orozco was the man who put Francisco Madero in power in Mexico. Orozco seized Juarez, and immediately upon the fall of Juarez President Diaz left Mexiço and turned the Government over to De la Barra, the provisional governor. At that time Pascuel Orozco's troops walked up to the American border and had handed them across the border all the arms and munitions of war which were needed to put Madero in power; but when, as they claim, he violated every principle upon which they had put him in power; when, as they claim, he or his family began to loot the treasury and proved himself to be more of a czar within a month than Diaz had in 30 years; when they were still in arms—not taking up arms again, but still in arms—and refused to recognize him as the president, he not carrying out the platform upon which they had put him in power, even when they protested; when they were confronted by his soldiers and sought to get ammunition for themselves again they were told that they could get arms and ammunition with which to unseat and drive from his country the greatest man that Mexico had ever produced—Porfirio Diaz—the man who did protect foreigners, who did protect American citizens, who did protect themselves against themselves; that they could with immunity get from this country the arms and ammunition with which to drive him from power; but when they sought to drive Madero from authority—according to their claim, the man who had betrayed them, betrayed every republican—the ports of the United States were closed and they could no longer get arms or ammunition. They believe, and for 50 years you will never be able to drive that belief from their minds, that the United States Government was behind the Madero revolution and that the United States Government is to-day protecting Madero from their righteous wrath.

Is it not the conditions brought about by the action of the United States Government which has given foundation for such things in the minds of the Mexican people? They are a kindly people. For many years I have known them intimately. I may be allowed to say, possibly, in passing, Senators, that I have known practically every man of any prominence in Mexico, I think, for the last 30 years, from Mr. Diaz himself to Pascuel Orozco. The Mexicans are a kindly people, but they are a simple people. They are like children in some respects. No government can say to those people, "You shall not do this" or "You shall not do that," and fail to enforce its orders, and ever thereafter recover the respect of those people, which we have lost. When you tell those people to do a certain thing or not to do a certain thing you should hesitate long before issuing such a mandate, but when it is issued back it up, if it takes every able-bodied man in the United States over 18 years of age to carry out your orders. Do not let us be placed in the position of undertaking to overawe a little nation like Nicaragua and be afraid to demand protection of American citizens from a nation such as Mexico.

Mr. President, the northern Mexicans who put Madero in power could secure, when fighting for him against Diaz, across our border or through the border customhouses, all ammunition and arms which they could pay for. Now, the same men, fighting against Madero, can not secure arms or ammunition through customhouses held by themselves and through which we are doing other business with them.

What impression, naturally, is made upon their minds?

Some very interesting thoughts might be suggested, if I had the time and the inclination, but I have neither, to comment upon a resolution which is now, I believe, before the Committee on Contingent Expenses of this body. That is a resolution for the appointment of a commission, I believe, to inquire into the connection of any American company or any American individuals with the revolution first inaugurated in Mexico against Diaz, and the continuance, if you please, of present conditions existing in that Republic, so called.

Mr. President, I am going to refer very briefly to the army, so called, of Mexico. We believe, or we are told, that the men who are following Orozco, although they are the same men who overthrew Diaz and put Madero in power, are organized or disorganized bandits and murderers, and that the followers of those men who are fighting under the banner of Huerta are true patriots, representing the best manhood and the best blood of Mexico.

Senators, I am not going to undertake to read you documents which I have from Tepic, from Sinaloa, from Colima, from Durango, from Oaxaca, from Sonora, and from almost every State in Mexico to show what the conditions are that exist in that Republic to-day. I will only refer in passing to the Indians of Oaxaca, the descendants of those people who were never conquered by the Spaniards of old. In the veins of Juarez, the deliverer of Mexico, ran the blood of those people. The Zapotecas Indians of Oaxaca alone, to the number of 2,000, are in arms controlling their State against the so-called Mexican Republic. The entire State of Morelos is in arms against the present constituted government. You saw this morning where a train within 30 miles of the City of Mexico was blown up and sixty-odd people were murdered on the Cuernavaca Road. The entire State of Sinaloa and all that lower country, including Tepic, with the exception of two or three different towns, such as Culiacan and Mazatlan, are in the hands of the rebels. Americans have been fleeing out of that country; some of them have been able to avail themselves of the opportunity to come back to the United States upon the ship which we sent down there recently, but others are not so fortunate. Those having their little all invested in real estate and in stock with which to work that real estate are yet, with their lives in their hands, seeking to protect themselves against what? Against bandits? No. In many instances against the so-called organized force of the Mexican Government and of Mr. Madero.

Senators, I said there was such censorship exercised that you can not get the true conditions from Mexico. I reiterate that. In addition to that, I want to say to you that 14 times within the last five months there have been published in the official daily papers in Tepic, Colima, and Sinaloa reports of Pascual Orozco's death; the last one that his own troops had killed him; and there has never been a denial made. The effort has been to show to those people through the official press that the revolution existing in other portions of the Republic is being smothered. Naturally they will undertake to make such impressions.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator inform us as to the number of Americans who have been killed and the number who have been wounded since this insurrection began?

Mr. FALL. It is very nearly impossible to do so. I have the names of a great number, but I have discovered that it has been practically impossible to get information from Mexico where one of our citizens was reported wounded or reported to be killed. I have tried it in one instance through the State Department, which I will cite to the Senator. I received a letter from Sonora, Mexico, brought out by special messenger, whom I had sent for the information, before the State Department of the United States could get a telegram from the American consul at Mazatlan.

Mr. POMERENE. Of how many such cases has the Senator actual knowledge—I mean by reason of his investigation?

Mr. FALL. My recollection is that there were 11 killed of whom we have definite knowledge; in these little colonies immediately below El Paso, of which I spoke, there have been two or three deaths of Americans, as I understand—one I know near the Dolores mine; also in Chihuahua. There have been other deaths in the different mining camps, but it is almost impossible to get the names of the parties or to get the facts.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the State Department of the Government been given any information as to these matters?

Mr. FALL. The State Department has had the names of these parties who are known.

Mr. President, they say that Orozco is being driven out. Orozco has never in his life, to my certain knowledge, been within the State of Sinaloa. They have had 14 governors in the State of Sinaloa under the Madero administration. Since he was inaugurated they have had 14 so-called governors in that State, and since April they have had none at all. The entire State is in the hands of rebels, with the exception of Culiacan and Mazatlan.

The people are leaving the city of Culiacan, a correspondent states, and he was a special man sent down there for the very purpose of getting information. He says:

> The government is at Mazatlan, in temporary exile, having run away from Culiacan with the evacuating Federal army, and Culiacan and Mazatlan are the only points in the State that keep up a pretense of government.

This is a State that you have heard nothing from even through the public press—

> The few members of the upper class who have not fled the State in search of safety are going as fast as they can get away.

These are the Mexicans.

> They froth at the mouth when told of Madero's optimistic promises about restoring order in the country.

The other letter was from Mazatlan; this is from Culiacan.

> The riff-raff of State troops now—

You read the press descriptions of the patriotic soldiers who are following Madero—

> The riff-raff of State troops now in Culiacan are the usual Madero kind—drunk and disorderly in their normal condition. Random shooting goes on in the city at all hours of day and night and nobody's life or property is safe. The exodus of well-to-do Mexicans continues.
>
> The rebels are gathering round Sinaloa, and that little city is probably to be located the third time soon, no garrison worthy of the name being there to defend it.
>
> * * * * * * *
> The biggest stores of Culiacan are going out of business, two lootings by rebels in less than a year being too much for them.

Even in Culiacan they have driven the Federals out twice during a year—

> The only hardware store in the city is closing. Some of the business men are leaving for good, others have so much at stake they will hang around to see if there ever is a government that will make it safe to live and do business under established laws here.
>
> The prefect of the city was publicly assaulted and insulted by disorderly State soldiers, and he could get no satisfaction from their more disorderly jefes. These hoodlum soldiers go roystering down the street crying "Viva Zapata" and there is none to challenge them.

These are Madero's government troops.

Here is a letter from Mazatlan:

> MAZATLAN, May 16, 1912.
> The Mexican transport General Guerrero came in yesterday loaded to the limit with convicts from the Mexico City and other Federal and State penitentiaries. Two hundred and fifty were unloaded here, with great precautions to prevent their escape between the vessel and the local troops headquarters, a strong guard of soldiers escorting them from ship to wharf, followed all the way by the searchlights of the Guerrero, and on the wharf they fell in between double lines of Federal soldiers for the march to the port. They are a sorry-looking bunch.

These are the recruits for the Government forces which are to drive out the bandits and restore order in Mexico.

> They are a sorry-looking bunch, many bareheaded and barefooted, and some without shirts, being the cast-off remnants of humanity which naturally flow into the penal institutions, and nobody is feeling very hopeful over this reenforcement of our Sinaloa army.

What does he mean by saying "the cast-off remnants of humanity which naturally flow into the penal institutions"?

Do you know, Senators, from what source the standing Army of Mexico is recruited? You are told of the great victory that Gen. Huerta won at Rellano a short time ago, but you were not told that at that time 400 of his troops, refusing to fight, were sent back to Mexico City, and are now confined in the salt works from which they came as convicts.

Sir, I have known the Mexican standing Army now for nearly 30 years. It has during that time and is to-day being recruited almost entirely from men serving terms in the penitentiary or in the salt mines of Mexico for some crime of more or less serious character. They are given their choice whether they shall serve in the Mexican Army or whether they shall go to the salt mines. I do not know which I would take, but these are the troops now who must protect American lives and liberty and property and Mexican lives and liberty and property against the "bandits."

I hold no brief to speak for Mr. Orozco, but I do speak for the American citizens in Mexico, and, over and above and greater than all, Senators, I speak for citizens of Mexico in the name of humanity. There has not been a time since Mr. Madero undertook to overthrow the Diaz government that by taking a strong position and maintaining it this Government of ours could not have put a stop to the outrages in Mexico and to the murder of Mexican citizens as well as American citizens. I say that it has been our fault very largely that these conditions exist in Mexico. That we are going to be compelled in some way to put a stop to these conditions in the name of humanity. Senators might just as well realize that now as a little later on. In my judgment, an ultimatum should be sent to the so-called Mexican Government that within a given length of time killing and destruction of property must cease in Mexico, and whenever the Mexican people really believe or realize that the American people have made up their minds to stop it, it will stop, and not before.

Mr. President, I am not advocating that the United States should intervene in Mexico by force of arms; I am not advocating such doctrines in the interest of American corporations or in the interest of American individuals who may have property in Mexico. I want to say to you now that there is not an American corporation in Mexico that does not resent the idea that any portion of that country—or that portion of it at least in which its property is situated—should ever, by any force or any circumstances, become a part of the United States. Why? Because they have never had to pay heavy taxes and do not have to pay them now, except to the representatives of the Government to whom they may choose to pay a stipend for overlooking the laws. There is not a mining company, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota who asked a question here the other day referring to his own resolution—there is not a mining company in Mexico that wants annexation or wants armed intervention. An American company to-day will pay taxes under what they call the iguala system; that is, they guess with the Government representative as to what the output of their mines will be for the next 12 months and agree on quarterly settlements. Who is now that Mexican official? Do you think that Mr. Madero gets any part of this? Very little; it goes down into the pockets of those local conservators of the peace and protectors of lives and liberty. It has been the case in years before, and it is just simply a little worse now; that is all.

Under the iguala system a small amount is paid—about one-tenth of the amount of the taxes. If the mines of Cananea, where $66,000,000 of American money is invested, were across the line in the State of Arizona, the Cananea Copper Co. would be paying taxes to the Government and to the State of Arizona of anywhere from five to one hundred times what they are paying now to the Mexican Government or paying to the State of Sonora. So do not think, Senators, that any corporations operating in Mexico are desiring intervention, but I say to you that if you refuse to extend to American citizens in Mexico—simply because they are in Mexico—the protection to which they are entitled, conditions in Mexico will grow worse and worse from day to day, and you mark what I say to you: The time will come, sooner or later, when you will be compelled by the voice of your own people to adopt more drastic measures than you would be called upon to adopt now.

Now, I desire to say that the joint resolution offered by the Committee on Foreign Relations as a substitute for the joint resolution of the Senator from Arizona should, in my mind, be adopted without a dissenting voice. But it does not go anything like far enough. Why should we not take up diplomatically the question of injury to our citizens? Why should we not take it up with Mexico diplomatically and follow it by such demands as to compel them to harken, that they shall no longer kill American citizens and outrage American girls? Why should we not say it diplomatically; and then if we must say it in some other way, why should we not say it as we have said it before to other and stronger nations than Mexico?

This substitute is along the right lines, because it takes it out of the power of the State Department longer to prevent an investigation of these claims of American citizens. The original joint resolution was directed to the State Department. I am glad to know that a committee of this great body, the Committee on Foreign Relations, believe that no longer should obstacles be thrown in the way of American citizens who are asking for relief such as these people in El Paso are asking; and I think they placed the matter in the appropriate department when they said the Department of War should take it up. I tell you now that the very effect of the passage of this joint resolution, when it is conveyed to the Government of Mexico and to the insurrectos in Mexico, will have a better effect than anything which this Government has done since Mr. Diaz was driven from Chapultepec.

The very fact that you say we take it out of the hands of the State Department and put it in the hands of the War Department to see that American claims are paid will have that effect. But you should go further. You should go at least as far as China has gone, certainly as far as Germany has gone, and say to the Mexican Government, "You must investigate and adjudicate the claims of American citizens for injury to their property and injury to their lives, within your own confines, and if you will not do it, we will make that a question which we will also put into the hands of the War Department of the American Government"; and then when you say it do it. If you do not intend to back up what you say, then better it is that you leave it to the people of Texas to deal with this question, and if they are the people I have known them to be since I first went among them, 35 years ago, take your troops out of their way, and they will deal with it.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from New Mexico takes his seat I should like to ask him one question. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the action taken by the Federal Government in the effort to prevent any assistance from American soil to those who might be in revolt against the Mexican Government, and the action taken looking to a discouragement and prevention of any associations or organizations of any kind, or even of individuals, making arrangements on this side of the border in reference to carrying on hostilities on the other side of the border were very largely, if not almost mainly, taken at the instance of the authorities of the State of Texas. The Senator from New Mexico——

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator kindly repeat that question?

Mr. BACON. It is a pretty long question.

Mr. FALL. Do you mean at the instance of the State of Texas?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir; at the instance of the officials of Texas; and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] himself introduced a resolution on that subject.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Texas is not here, and the Senator from Georgia is apparently speaking for him, and I want to ask that Senator a question or two. Does the Senator from Georgia mean to say that at the instance of the State of Texas Gen. Sanjinas and Gen. Garibaldi and other officers connected with the Madero forces have been allowed to go into Texas, and into the office of the Mexican consul and there proceed to recruit soldiers for the Mexican army, so called, the Madero army? Does he mean that that has been done at the instance of the State of Texas? Does he mean that it has been at the instance of the State of Texas that the Mexican consul located at El Paso, Tex., has had arrested for the last four months from time to time American and Mexican citizens, who were placed in jail and held there for as much as 40 days at a time on the ground, on his claim alone, under the treaty of amity and peace and extradition with Mexico, under the claim upon his part, unsubstantiated by any evidence, that he would in a short time produce papers from the City of Mexico asking for their extradition? Does the Senator think that the State of Texas has had anything to do with that?

Mr. BACON. The Senator is asking me a longer question than the one I asked him. Of course I am not——

Mr. FALL. I understood the Senator to say——

Mr. BACON. I will wait until the Senator from New Mexico completes his question.

Mr. FALL. All right. The Senator can take his own time and make his own speech.

Mr. BACON. No; I want to wait until the Senator finishes his question, because when I start to reply I should like to do so.

Mr. FALL. As the Senator has started a line of thought, I want to refer to it further.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me answer the question. He asked me a question. It is only fair that I should reply to it.

Mr. FALL. I did not intend to ask the Senator from Georgia a question in answer to a question. He asked me if I was aware of certains things which he proceeded to state. I said no. Then I asked him if he meant to say that the State of Texas was responsible for these acts to which I have referred. Now, if the Senator desires to answer that, I will yield, of course.

Mr. BACON. I know nothing about the matters about which the Senator has inquired; but I want to state as concisely as I can what I did mean by the question and also the information upon which I based the question.

My information is that representations have been made to the United States Government that a great evil existed in the State of Texas in the fact that parties who were conspiring together to foment discord in Mexico or to assist in revolt of one kind or another used the State of Texas as a place in which their arrangements were made, in which the plans were formed, and that the State of Texas in communicating that fact to the Government of the United States expressed the strong desire that such steps should be taken as would prevent such plans being formed and such expeditions being practically arranged for and fitted out as would enable these military operations to be conducted in Mexico through such opportunities as would be afforded by the parties interested in their having the seat of their operations in the State of Texas. As I stated, the Senator from Texas himself, Mr. CULBERSON, has introduced a resolution looking to that end.

I am not taking issue with what the Senator has said in his very earnest and enlightening speech. I am simply adverting to what the Senator said in the latter part of it about what the State of Texas would do. So far as I have been able to gather—and I am sorry the Senator is not here to answer for himself—I think the State of Texas is opposed to its territory being used as a base from which military operations of any kind, either for or against the Madero government, shall be arranged for and practically prosecuted. I do not believe the State of Texas itself is ready to invade the Republic of Mexico, or any part of it, or desires to do so.

Mr FALL. Mr. President, I find myself somewhat at a loss to know exactly what I have said that has brought this down upon me. But I have at least made the same distinction that has been made by our State Department. I am learning diplomacy myself since I have been here, sir. I have at least made the same distinction that has been made by our State Department in its communications to the Mexican Government. I distinguished between a State and its people. I did not say anything about the State of Texas. I said the people of the State of Texas might do such and such things if the American Government would get out of the way.

It appears, however, that for some reason the State of Texas has wanted these troops there. Unless it was to keep them from going across the border, I do not know what the reason for it was. The only thing that has been done by any of the people of the State of Texas or any of their officials, so far as I know, is that which I called the attention of the Senate to a while ago, when two Texas rangers did what 200 United States troops refused to do—drove the Mexicans back across the international line.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he has made to the State Department the representations and citations of facts and conditions that he has presented to the Senate this afternoon?

Mr. FALL. I have not. This is the first time I have tried to make this speech, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will yield for a moment, I think the statement of facts and conditions made to the Senate by the Senator from New Mexico presents an outrageous condition of affairs, of disrespect and indifference by the State Department to the rights of American citizens. If it is true, and the State Department has been derelict to the extent represented by the Senator from New Mexico, I think it is the duty of Congress to investigate the matter, and if necessary to pass some legislation to compel the executive departments of this Government to protect and respect the rights of American citizens.

The Senator has depicted a very wretched state of affairs in the way of atrocities, injustices, and wrongs perpetrated on American citizens. I hope he will lay the matter before the State Department, and if it does not take prompt action, that he will ask the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate to investigate this state of affairs and recommend legislation that will protect the rights of American citizens.

I want to say for myself, as a Senator of the United States, that if that state of facts exists on the border line I feel ashamed that the Government of this great Nation should have been so indifferent and derelict as has been stated by the Senator from New Mexico. If a government so strong and potential as this can be so indifferent to American rights as has been represented, we ought to hang our heads in shame and in disgrace.

After the Senator has presented these facts and conditions to the State Department, if that department does not take prompt action to correct the matter, I hope the Senator will introduce such a resolution as I have described, so that Congress, through its proper committees, especially of the Senate, may take steps to see that this injustice to American citizens is not further continued.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, this matter evidently has been presented to and has had the serious attention of the State Department. They have had presented to them all the facts with reference to the killing that occurred on this side of the river. The President of the United States has had his attention called to it, and sent a message to Congress with reference to the deaths that occurred at Agua Prieta. The lower House of Congress has had presented to it a resolution which has been pending there for months. The same facts have been presented to the committee that were presented to the State Department.

I will say further to the Senator from Virginia that for several weeks the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has had before the Committee on Foreign Affairs his resolution, which has not yet been acted upon, which is only now being considered, and with reference to which there has not been one word said upon the floor of this Chamber until this afternoon. That resolution has been before the Foreign Affairs Committee of this body now for more than a month, I think.

I have wondered at this, sir. It has been a matter of surprise to me—and "surprise" is not a strong enough word to use. I can not understand what baleful influence has cast its shadow over this Government of ours, that no man can be found who will lift up his voice for the protection of the lives of American citizens and the virtue of American women. I can not understand it. When the Senate appoints a committee to investigate this matter, if it will appoint some one who will investigate the causes of the present conditions in Mexico, the causes of the revolution which drove Porfirio Diaz from power, and the connection, possibly in the United States, then and now, with those causes and those conditions, we may finally get some information as to why this absolute apathy has existed in the face of the conditions known to this Government.

I will say this, further, to the Senator from Virginia: In view of the fact that when these undisputed matters were presented to the State Department and it refused to even take up and consider the killing of American citizens on this side of the line, what use was there of doing anything—what would the Senator have done—with reference to the killing of American citizens on the other side of the line?

But, it is said, they have protected American citizens on the other side of the line. I have referred to the Fountain case, where an American citizen was seized, whom we ordered them not to shoot and whom they did shoot while we turned our backs, since which we have said nothing. In that case the documents which I had in my hand came to me from the State Department, because young Fountain was the son of a citizen of New Mexico. His mother was the granddaughter of one of the last Spanish governors of Mexico and an American citizen. I did take up with the State Department, until I got to a certain point, the matter of the death of Fountain, or of something to be done with reference to the death of Fountain in particular. Then the suggestion was made to me that he was not an American citizen. Since proof was made to their satisfaction that he was an American citizen, not another word has been said about it.

I must say to the Senator from Virginia that if anything is to be taken up with the State Department, I hope it will be through some more powerful hands than mine.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). To whom does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Virginia, who has been asking me some questions. I did not see the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate take the speech of the Senator from New Mexico—which, to my mind, is an aggregation of wrongs, injustices, and atrocities that ought to stir the heart of every American—with its citations of facts and conditions, ascertain as far as it can the accuracy of them, and then report to the Senate whether the Executive department of this Government has been derelict in its assertion of American rights.

Speaking for myself as a Senator from Virginia, I will say that I believe any American citizen should be protected wherever he goes in his lawful rights, and that the Government owes it to itself, its honor, and its prestige to defend and protect its citizens. If our Government has been derelict in that respect, it should be known, and the Government should ascertain those who have been derelict and take proper steps to assert American rights, American privileges, and to protect the prestige and honor of this Nation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, inasmuch as this debate has arisen upon a joint resolution which I introduced, I think it but due to the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Relations to give, in a minute, something of the history of it. All know of the outrages in El Paso and, in my own State, in Douglas. I saw the people there just after it occurred. I do not know whether it was done, but I filed an application, or at least a notification, to be sent to the Department of State here asking that some steps be taken toward an adjudication or a settlement of the damages which occurred in that outrage. When I arrived here my attention was particularly called to the matter by a Representative from the State of Texas, Judge SMITH, who had introduced a resolution in the House similar to the one I afterwards introduced here. In response to that resolution the Secretary of State made a report, which was printed, and the substance of it was that if the people were killed on American soil they, with their witnesses must go to Mexico and establish in a foreign tribunal their rights.

I was so impressed and startled by such a doctrine that I went with it myself to the Secretary of State, but I did not find him present. However, I did submit the question to the department, with my strong disagreement to any such doctrine, and insisted that when a man was killed under those circumstances on American soil our own Government was responsible to him.

My resolution, I think, went before the committee a month or more ago. Then the two great national parties met in national convention. That delayed it; but I went to some member of the subcommittee daily until finally this joint resolution was brought in as a substitute for the one of Congressman SMITH, of Texas, a copy of which I had introduced in this body. I say this in justice to him.

The committee reported the resolution, and I want to ask a question of one of the members of the subcommittee, the Senator from Georgia. I did not think it went quite far enough, in that it simply said they should investigate, and whatever damages they might find they should report to Congress. I do not know that I am well enough acquainted with the diplomatic relations, but I would have liked it better to have declared that whatever they found Congress should pay to its own citizens, and that the United States itself should make a demand on the Government of Mexico.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to state in response to the inquiry of the Senator that the sense, I am sure, of the committee was that the Government of the United States should pay whatever damages were ascertained, by the machinery sought to be set in motion, to have been sustained by citizens of the United States on American soil. There was evidently a good reason why that conclusion should not have been incorporated in the resolution. The design was that the resolution should be promptly passed and that proceedings should be had under it immediately. There would be no division whatever upon the question as to whether this investigation should be made, and therefore there would be no impediment placed in the way of prompt consideration and action under it. If, however, we had incorporated in the resolution what the Senator now speaks of, a command or a conclusion or determination that the Government should pay it, that would at once have led to discussion and delay. Therefore it was deemed better that the resolution should not be encumbered with a provision of that kind, which would have delayed it, but that it should be presented in a way which would most readily command unanimous support so that the matter should be proceeded with.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Permit me to interrupt the Senator right there. I want in line with what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has been saying to say that probably it might have a salutary effect when the Republic of Mexico saw that our Republic would pay the damages themselves and make a national claim against the other Government. It might show such an express determination that the Senate itself would agree that it ought to pass.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator will readily recognize that a provision of that kind is one which would have led to discussion and delay; that a final conclusion would be more readily reached by an investigation as to what the damages are and the circumstance under which they were sustained or suffered; and that when that information was given to the Senate and to the country it would be much easier to get through a resolution which would provide for the payment by the United States of those damages with the purpose on the part of the United States then itself to expect that the Government of Mexico would make the Government of the United States whole as to the expenditure thus made.

I want to say for myself that that is what I think should be done as to damages which have been suffered by our own citizens upon American soil, for the simple reason that Americans are entitled to protection from the United States Government against such injuries, and if the circumstances were such that the Government of the United States could not then protect them the Government should make them whole and itself look to the foreign government for reimbursement.

Now, Mr. President, as to the damages which have been suffered by citizens of the United States upon Mexican soil, of course the conditions are entirely different. The most that can be claimed in that case is that the Government of the United States will by every proper means seek to see that those damages are made good, whether they be damages to person or damages to property, and I have no doubt that the Government will endeavor to enforce recompense for such damages. They are not damages of a kind which can be dealt with in the same way that damages are dealt with which have been suffered by American citizens on our own soil.

I do not wish, Mr. President, to be understood in the suggestion which I made to the Senator from New Mexico as to the attitude of the State of Texas for a moment to question the fact that they should be paid for by the Mexican Government, or the fact that prompt measures should be taken for the purpose of enforcing such payment. At the same time, I recognize the fact that it is not a matter which can be dealt with in a day, or a week, or a month.

I quite agree with the Senator on the proposition that our citizens who suffered damages on our own soil, or who suffered damages on Mexican soil, should not be remitted to Mexican courts. I do not for a moment recognize the propriety of that course. These damages are very great. They will aggregate immense sums, because of our proximity to Mexico and the large number of our citizens who have been engaged in business there. The damages there, I suppose, have been tenfold greater, I expect a hundredfold greater, to American citizens than to the citizens or subjects of any other country. Therefore, it is a very much larger question and one proportionately more difficult to deal with.

I have not read the article the Senator from New Mexico commented upon, or, rather, the opinion—I do not know whether it is a report or what it is; anyhow, it was some emanation from the State Department on this subject. There are some damages which have been suffered by citizens of my own State, and which I myself have heretofore taken up with the State Department, or called their attention to. Therefore, even if I had no other higher influence, I could not be indifferent to this question. I am not. But at the same time, Mr. President, I recognize that it is one of extreme difficulty to deal with, and it has to be dealt with in a way which shall be the least injurious to our own country, and which shall——

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FALL. The Senator says he has taken up cases with the State Department. Can the Senator mention any case in which the State Department has endeavored to do anything to arrange it or regulate it, or even to put it in effect? The Senator says he realizes it takes time. There has been a year's time. Is the State Department going to do anything?

Mr. BACON. It has not had a year's time to act on the damages I referred to.

Mr. FALL. Well——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me until I finish the sentence——

Mr. FALL. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BACON. The damages to which I referred as suffered in my own State are of more recent infliction. Therefore I am not prepared to answer the Senator as to matters which have been before the State Department for a year. I do not know whether the Senator knows of matters which have been within the cognizance of the State Department as long a time ago as a year. Of course I have no more right to speak for the State Department than any other Senator who is here.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator mean to say the State Department has taken up diplomatically for the purpose of settling damages in the cases that he himself presented?

Mr. BACON. I do not. I am simply stating the fact that in what I have said I can not possibly be construed as occupying a position of indifference to the payment of these claims. I am calling attention to the fact that I have a personal interest in it; that is, I mean officially personal to myself only in so far as it relates to my immediate constituency.

I am in entire sympathy with the desire that these matters shall be brought to a head, and shall be brought to a head as speedily as possible. I entirely agree that the remitting of our citizens to the courts of Mexico is not the proper way in which to proceed, but we should deal directly with the Mexican Government upon such matters.

Mr. President, it is a very grave and a very difficult question. I will say to the Senator very frankly I do not wish matters presented in such a way as to precipitate this country into war. If the Senator wants to know whether I am in favor of invading Mexico with a couple hundred thousand men and precipitating this country into a war with Mexico for the purpose of enforcing the immediate payment of those claims, I will tell him no; I am not.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator think for one moment that I have been occupying the time of the Senate simply talking about dollars and cents and insisting that we should go down to the City of Mexico with an army to collect dollars and cents? If the Senator has listened to what I have been saying, it seems to me that he can not entertain that idea; but if he does, if he thinks the purpose of my talk here this afternoon has been simply to express that somebody wants the American Army to secure dollars and cents there, then I want to disabuse the Senator's mind. That was not my intention.

Mr. BACON. I suppose, Mr. President, that the idea in the mind of the Senator was that there should be a moneyed compensation for damages which had been inflicted. If I did not understand him correctly there, then, of course, I misunderstood him.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. If I intimated that an army should be sent into Mexico for any purpose I do not recall it. The Senator has stated that if I want to know whether he is willing to send an army down to Mexico to secure these damages he wanted me to understand he was not. I say with perfect and equal frankness to the Senator that if it becomes necessary to protect one American citizen in Mexico or anywhere else to send 200,000 men there to do it, I am in favor of sending American troops there to do it, not to collect a dollar, but to protect an American citizen, wherever he may be.

Mr. BACON. Of course those are all patriotic sentiments which appeal to all of us. We naturally want to protect American citizens, and we naturally want to bring to our consciousness the recognition of the great power of this Government and our ability to do it. Nevertheless, we, in our position of very grave responsibility, which involves the happiness and the peace and welfare of the entire country, have to proceed to accomplish results in a way which, while they may certainly accomplish them, will not accomplish them in a way to bring disaster and suffering and war, if you please, the greatest of all evils, upon this country. I do not think it is necessary that we should go to war in order to accomplish these ends. I do not believe the Senator from New Mexico thinks it necessary.

Mr. FALL. I have distinctly disavowed any such purpose.

Mr. BACON. All I am trying to present is that in the absence of compulsion, which is another word for war when applied to nations, we must proceed diplomatically; that we must proceed through diplomatic negotiations; that we must proceed in a way which will avoid those conflicts. While that course may necessarily entail very undesirable delays, nevertheless we must submit to delays in negotiations between countries unless we are prepared to lay down an ultimatum and back that ultimatum with force. That is all there is to it.

Now, I am in thorough accord with the desire of the Senator that the United States Government, through its State Department—and the Executive—which deals with these international matters, shall proceed with all due dispatch and that we shall do the best we can to secure for our citizens who have suffered, either in their persons or their property, in Mexico just compensation for those injuries. At the same time we must do so in a way not to bring a greater evil upon this country than has already been suffered by some of its citizens.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have been in session now nearly seven hours and a half——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It will not take long, if the Senator grants the request.

Mr. SMOOT. There are very few Senators present now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know, but nobody objects to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any objection to-morrow morning to unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It has to pass through the House, Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. It will not hasten it a particle to dispose of it to-day. There are only a few Senators here. I have no objection to the joint resolution. I am ready to vote for it myself right now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. So am I.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do think it would be unwise to vote upon a proposition so late in the evening, when there are only a few Senators here. I kindly ask the Senator to leave it until to-morrow morning. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 23, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 22, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, fill our minds and hearts with the strength and purity of the Holy Spirit, that we may walk worthy of the vocation whereunto Thou hast called us, and leave behind us a trail which others may follow with impunity and upon which we may look back with pardonable pride and feel the thrill of Thine approval. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to agree to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 21477. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 19403. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics on cotton.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 23673, under the rule adopted last Thursday, for further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has 62 minutes left, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] has 16.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] desire some time? I offered the other day to yield 10 minutes to him. I can yield him 12 minutes now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the title of this bill is:

A bill to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

Now, ordinarily there can be no dispute about the desirability of the object expressed in the title. I have examined the majority report and the minority report on this bill, and it seems to me that the minority are manifestly wrong, and I can not follow such leadership. The facts are that the imprisonment of sailors for deserting their vessels has long since been abolished in the merchant marine of the United States, so far as the coastwise trade is concerned and so far as the ports on this continent north of the Caribbean Sea. So that an American seaman—that is to say, a seaman on an American vessel—can not and has not been since 1898 lawfully arrested or imprisoned and put in irons for deserting his vessel at any port on this continent north of the Caribbean Sea. And I find that the Commissioner of Navigation in the Department of Commerce and Labor has repeatedly recommended the abolition of imprisonment for desertion upon all merchant vessels of the United States, whether engaged in the domestic or the foreign trade. I will insert extracts of these reports in the RECORD.

He prints tables showing that the number of desertions is so infinitesimal as the small fraction of 1 per cent of all the thousands who are engaged both in the domestic and foreign trade. So it is not a matter of very great commercial importance. It would not affect the trade at all appreciably. But even if it did, it should not deter us from extending the principles of liberty even to the laborers upon the sea.

The question of abolishing imprisonment for desertion in the foreign vessels entering our ports takes on a little different form. Under the laws of the United States and treaties with foreign nations our courts and our officers, upon complaint of any foreign consul or representative of a foreign country that a sailor has deserted a foreign ship in our ports, are compelled to apprehend that sailor and imprison him and surrender him to the master of a foreign vessel in our ports, even though the ground of the complaint is simply that the sailor deserted the vessel and ceased working out his term of enlistment or employment.

It is stated here in this minority report that this bill is chiefly for the benefit of foreigners. I think that is a very narrow view. Broadly speaking, if this bill makes it more expensive for the ships of a foreign flag to operate, if by reason of abolishing arrests for desertion the sailors that come here will desert, and the foreign ships will have to employ sailors at a higher wage, or if this law shall succeed in requiring the foreign vessels to feed their crews better and provide more accommodations and more space, and require them to give their sailors shorter hours, necessarily it will increase the expense of operation of foreign vessels. But we are not legislating to help foreign vessel owners.

If we could by these means increase the expense of our competitors, necessarily we would better the conditions of our own sailors as well as of theirs, so that it is not logical to say that this is exclusively for the benefit of foreigners. It is, no doubt, legislation that will result in increased expense to the foreign shipowners, and that is what is desired by our vessel owners, in order that they may compete with them on more even terms. There are two ways in which you can successfully compete with any competitor—either reduce your expenses to his level or compel him to raise his expenses to your level. This bill has the tendency to do this, and by means of this provision, together with another provision mentioned in the report, giving Americans the right to purchase vessels abroad to be used in the foreign trade, of which we have practically none now, it would seem as though our people would be placed on a plane approaching an equality with foreign competitors.

But there are humanitarian reasons why this legislation should be enacted. It is not true that we are simply concerned in the matter of making money. There is a great principle at stake here. These sailors in foreign countries sign shipping articles sometimes for three years upon tramp vessels that come to our ports, and notably to the ports on the Pacific coast, and engaged in the trade between South America and the United States—for instance, between San Francisco and Portland and the ports of South America on the west coast in the coffee trade—and receive only one-half the wages paid in the same trade in our American ships. And if these sailors desert they are arrested and imprisoned and surrendered to the masters of those vessels.

In that way we are in effect performing the function of slave catchers. We are enforcing a fugitive-slave law against these foreign sailors who escape from their vessels, and we return them to that servitude; and we do this to reduce the expense of our competitor at sea. It is involuntary servitude, more in violation of the principles of which we are so proud, than the peonage cases that are being prosecuted in some of the States with so much vigor. There is a greater injustice in some of these arrests of sailors for the mere fact of quitting their employment contrary to the shipping articles than in any peonage case that has come to my notice.

The argument that to repeal this law and abrogate these treaties would be interfering with the rights of foreign shipowners seems to me unsound and not founded in reason. It is not only our people that are free, but our soil is free—and whoever touches our shores becomes free. Let us remember that this was recognized even in the Dred Scott case. Dred Scott brought his action in Missouri and claimed the right of liberty because his master had taken him to the Territory of Minnesota—to Fort Snelling—and there kept him for several years, and he invoked the doctrine laid down by Lord Mansfield in the Somerset case, to wit, that "whenever a human being in slavery touches his foot on British soil he becomes a free man forever." [Applause.] But the Supreme Court, in deciding the Dred Scott case, distinguished it from the Somerset case, because they said the action was brought in the State of Missouri, where slavery was lawful, and that therefore the plaintiff must fail, notwithstanding the fact that he had once been in free territory. The court, however, was careful not to overrule the doctrine of the Somerset case, and had Scott's action been brought in a free State, according to the logic of the opinion, the decision would have been the other way. It will thus be seen that even this much-denounced decision recognizes the doctrine of free soil.

Sommersett was a negro slave brought from Virginia to England in 1770 by a Mr. Steuart, the owner, and after two years' service he escaped and was forcibly seized by Steuart's orders and placed on board a ship lying in the Thames bound for Jamaica, where it was proposed to sell him into slavery. The friends of the negro sued out a writ of habeas corpus against the master of the vessel, and the Court of King's Bench, Lord Mansfield presiding, liberated him in 1772.

But this doctrine against involuntary servitude is much older even than the Somerset case. In the brief in the Dred Scott case there are decisions cited as old as the eleventh century, and they also refer to the ordinance of William the Conqueror, that a residence of any of the servile population of England for a year and a day without being claimed, in any city, burg, walled town, or castle of the King, should entitle them to perpetual liberty, as an early instance of this doctrine.

Laws in diminution of the power of a man to reclaim an escaped bondman in Europe commenced with the laws in favor of privileged communes or towns. The earliest publicist who has discussed this subject is Bodin, a jurist of the sixteenth century, whose work was quoted in the early discussions of the courts in France and England on this subject. He says:

In France, although there be some remembrance of old servitude, yet it is not lawful here to make a slave or to buy anyone of others, insomuch as the slaves of strangers, as soon as they set their foot within France, become frank and free, as was determined by an old decree of the court of Paris against an ambassador of Spain who had brought a slave with him into France.

He states another case which arose in the city of Toulouse, of a Genoese merchant who had carried a slave into that city on his voyage from Spain; and when the matter was brought before the magistrates the—procurer of the city, out of the records, showed certain ancient privileges given unto them of Toulouse, wherein it was granted that slaves, as soon as they should come into Toulouse, should be free.

If the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and especially the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who have not only signed this minority report, but have spoken against this bill, really believe in the principles upon which the Republican Party is founded, the principles of human liberty everywhere, why should they draw this narrow distinction and oppose this bill because besides liberating our own sailors it would liberate foreign sailors also?

The platforms recently adopted both by the Republican and Democratic national conventions favor the principles of this bill. It is not and should not be considered as a partisan measure.

Why not all join the army of liberation, demand the abrogation of all treaties for the recapture of fugitive seamen, the repeal of these peonage laws, and proclaim liberty not only throughout the land but throughout the seas also? Let the American Nation demand this and working conditions on the sea will improve, and the merchant marine will attract the bravest and the best to the adventurous and romantic "life upon the ocean wave" and will restore itself to its ancient greatness.

Do this, and the world will say, when it sees our glorious flag proudly floating in the breeze, "There is the flag that means freedom on land and sea. Hail to the emblem of universal liberty!"

I was too young to take part in the Civil War, but it has been a source of pride and satisfaction to me to recall the fact that my father shouldered his gun and fought in that war for the cause of freedom; and if the dead take an interest in the affairs of the living, I believe he is now urging me on in the fight for liberty in order that our flag upon the sea may float over free men instead of over the enslaved and degraded. Let it become the real emblem of universal liberty everywhere! [Applause.]

MEMORIAL.

The seamen of the United States of America, through their committee, duly appointed at their national meeting, held at New York City in the month of November, 1909, respectfully petition for the passage of Senate bill 6155, House bill 11193, being substantially identical bills.

And in support of said petition your petitioners respectfully represent and state as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to humanitarians, democrats, Christians, and friends of human freedom everywhere:

Do we, the seamen, the yet remaining bondmen, humbly yet earnestly submit this our petition, that we be made free men and that the blighting disgrace of bondage be removed from our labor, which once was considered honorable, which is yet needed in the world of commerce, and which has been held to be of great importance to nations with seacoasts to defend.

Existing maritime law makes of us, excepting in the domestic trade of the United States, the property of the vessel on which we sail. We can not work as seamen without signing a contract which brings us under this law. This contract is fixed by law or authorized by governments. We have nothing to do with its terms. We either sign it and sail, or we sign it not and remain landsmen.

When signing this contract, we surrender our working power to the will of another man at all times while the contract runs. We may not, on pain of penal punishment, fail to join the vessel. We may not leave the vessel, though she is in perfect safety. We may not, without our master's permission, go to a mother's sick bed or funeral, or attend to any other duties of a son, brother, a Christian, or a citizen, excepting in the domestic trade of these United States.

If the owner thinks he has reason to fear that we desire to escape, he may, without judicial investigation, cause us to be imprisoned for safe-keeping until he shall think proper to take us out. If we have escaped, he may publish our personal appearance along with a reward for our apprehension and return. He may, through contracts between nations, cause the peace officers and police to aid him in recovering his property. The captain may change, the owner may change—we are sold with the vessel—but so long as the flag does not change there is nothing except serious illness or our master's pleasure that will release us from the vessel.

The master, acting for the vessel, may release himself and the vessel by paying a few dollars, with no alternative.

He that owns another man's labor power owns his body, since the two can not be separated.

We stand in the same relation to the vessel as the serf did to the estate, as the slave to his master. When serfdom was abolished in western Europe we were forgotten by the liberators and our status remained. When the slaves of the United States and Brazil were emancipated our status continued. When serfdom was abolished in Russia no change came to us.

We now raise our manacled hands in humble supplication and pray that the nations issue a decree of emancipation and restore to us our right as brother men; to our labor that honor which belonged to it until your power, expressing itself through your law, set upon it the brand of bondage in the interest of cheap transportation by water.

We respectfully submit that the serfdom of the men in our calling is of comparatively modern origin. Earlier maritime law bound, while in strange countries and climes, the seaman to his shipmates and the ship, and the ship to him, on the principle of common hazard. In his own country he was free—the freest of men. We further humbly submit that, as the consciousness of the seaman's status penetrates through the population, it will be impossible to get freemen to send their sons into bondage or to induce freemen's sons to accept it, and we, in all candor, remind you that you, when you travel by water, expect us—the serfs—to exhibit in danger the highest qualities of freemen by giving our lives for your safety.

At sea the law of common hazard remains. There must be discipline and self-sacrifice, but in any harbor the vessel and you are safe, and we beseech you give to us that freedom which you claim for yourself and which you have bestowed on others, to the end that we may be relieved of that bitterness of soul that is the heavy burden of him who knows and feels that his body is not his own.

DESERTION OF SEAMEN.

The percentage of seamen who desert from American vessels is relatively small, and desertion has ceased to be so considerable a factor in American shipping affairs as it was in the days of sailing vessels. The percentage of seamen who fail to report on board after having signed articles before shipping commissioners in ports of the United States for the past nine years is shown by the following table:

Year.	Shipped and reshipped.	Failed to join.	Per cent.
1902	108,554	4,278	3.94
1903	120,785	5,187	4.29
1904	112,957	3,857	3.41
1905	120,782	3,273	2.71
1906	126,745	3,894	3.07
1907	143,399	4,007	2.79
1908	163,192	3,101	1.90
1909	181,032	2,114	1.17
1910	185,721	2,690	1.45

The facts concerning desertion of seamen from American vessels in foreign ports are even more significant. Reports for the past fiscal year have been received from 259 American consulates, which cover practically our entire consular representation at foreign maritime ports. These reports show the clearances (counting repeated voyages) of 1,847 American steamers and 657 American sail vessels. The details are printed in Appendix C. The following table shows the number of the crews of these vessels, the number of seamen shipped and discharged in foreign ports, and the number of deserters:

Vessels.	Men.	Shipped.	Discharged.	Deserters.
Steam	137,612	15,670	15,335	335
Sail	7,001	1,395	1,070	157
Total	144,613	17,065	16,405	492

Out of a total of 144,613 men (counting repeated voyages), only 492 deserted, or scarcely 1 out of 300—a percentage so small as to be inappreciable. There are two possible explanations for these facts. Conditions of life on American vessels may be in the main so satisfactory that seamen prefer to remain with their ships rather than seek by desertion the conditions of labor in foreign ports or on foreign ships. Another theory was set forth in Senate Document No. 379, Sixty-first Congress, second session, in which certain seamen of the United States allege that the seamen "stand in the same relation to the vessel as the serf did to the estate, as the slave to his master." At the International Seamen's Congress held at Copenhagen, August 27, 1910, the first resolution read:

"That the following changes and improvements be made in the maritime legislation of every country:

"1. The abolition of imprisonment of seamen deserting ships while in a safe harbor."

The Copenhagen resolutions and the Senate document enumerated concerning the imprisonment of seamen for desertion, so far from being progressive, are 12 years behind the legislation of the United States. The act of December 21, 1898, abolished the penalty of imprisonment for desertion from American vessels in ports of the United States, the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the West Indies, and Mexico. More than nine-tenths of the seamen on American vessels by the act of December 21, 1898, were thus relieved and have been for 12 years from the penalty of imprisonment for desertion. Outside the countries named the law of the United States still provides for arrest for desertion, but it is a dead letter. The reason is expressed concisely by the American consul at Southampton, England, where 121 out of 335 desertions from American steamers occurred:

"No requests for arrests were made by any master losing the men. The policy of the masters has been to let all such men go, they being able at all times to fill all vacancies so created in the crew."

In fact, in foreign ports where imprisonment is still permitted by our law, last year American consuls reported only 8 arrests. One seaman was arrested and returned to his ship at Tahiti, Society Islands, 2 at Hakodate, Japan, and 3 at Manila. At Port Elizabeth, Cape of Good Hope, the consul caused the arrest of 1 American seaman from the bark Charmer. The consul reports:

"He was arrested by the local authorities and imprisoned for a few hours only, and at his own request was placed aboard his ship, from whence he again deserted and has not since been apprehended."

The consul at Montevideo caused the arrest of a deserter from the whaler Andrew Hicks.

These facts do not justify any American seaman in the statement against the laws of his country:

"We now raise our manacled hands in humble supplication and pray that the nations issue a decree of emancipation and restore to us our right as brother men."

The fragment of American law which still authorizes the arrest of seamen for desertion from American ships in remote ports may well be repealed because it is a dead letter. Whether foreign nations should repeal their laws providing for the arrest and imprisonment of deserting seamen from their ships is a matter concerning which for obvious reasons this bureau is not called upon to express an opinion.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DESERTION.

The law permitting the imprisonment of seamen for desertion from American vessels in ports of the United States and in near-by foreign ports was repealed by the act of December 21, 1898. As our ships seldom cross the oceans, that act covers practically all phases of American navigation. It was not followed by increased desertions nor did it impair discipline on shipboard. At present a seaman deserting from an American ship in the harbors of Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, Oceania, and South America south of the Caribbean Sea may be imprisoned. Few American ships visit those ports, and out of their total crews not one man in a hundred deserts. There are virtually no cases of imprisonment. When a man deserts an American ship abroad, he is rarely interfered with and not infrequently he regrets his course and appeals to the American consul for assistance. There are more cases of complaint that men have been driven to desert than of complaint of arrest after desertion. The remnant of law actually serves only one purpose, to furnish ground for rhetorical protest that American seamen are treated as chattels and that the law keeps them in fetters and is a survival of the spirit of the fugitive-slave law. The repeal of the statute on which the complaint is based was recommended last year, and the recommendation is renewed. It can be brought about by a simple act of few words, declaring that imprisonment as a penalty for desertion of seamen from vessels of the United States is hereby abolished and sections 4596 and 4600 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of December 21, 1898, are hereby amended accordingly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the marine law, an American sailor in the coastwise trade may leave his ship at any time before the anchor is drawn or on arriving in safe harbor, the penalty for violating his contract being a forfeiture of all his wages, advance pay being prohibited under the present coastwise laws and under this bill.

An American sailor having taken a contract for a foreign voyage, if he deserts in any foreign port, is acknowledged by the American marine law to be subject to arrest and imprisonment and to be returned to the ship. If returned to the vessel, his wages are subject to the costs of his capture and detention. If not returned to the vessel, his wages are forfeited.

On the other hand, in the event of not being returned to the vessel, he is subject to the penalty of one month's imprisonment and the loss of all wages.

A foreigner in an American port is, under the marine law, subject to the same penalties as an American in a foreign port.

Practically speaking, an American sailor who, on shore leave, complains to a consul or to other authority of ill treatment, has his testimony discredited by the assumption that in such testimony he is endeavoring to break his contract. If, after desertion, he should make similar complaint he would be liable to arrest and punishment, and his statements concerning abuses which caused said desertion would be discredited.

This bill, first, by abolishing the unusual penalty of enforced labor, places the sailor on terms of industrial equality with men working in other trades, and at the same time by permitting civil damages to be assessed against desertion in the collectible terms of forfeited pay strengthens his inducement to carry out his contract which, in its nature, should be more binding upon him, than contracts in other lines, where replacement is easier.

Second, by providing for relinquishment of contract by sailors of foreign vessels it tends to equalize the wages of those engaged in international commerce, thereby rendering the service more dignified, more responsible, and more apt to enlist the services of those fitted to assume the tremendous responsibilities that go with the preservation of lives and property at sea.

It is inconceivable that any Member of this House would permit a son to serve as a common sailor in international trade under existing laws. Just as long as certain occupations are of such a nature as to preclude self-respecting men from engaging in them, there will always be a severe strain upon our theories of democracy.

We are anxious to have a merchant marine, but we can have no object in encouraging a merchant marine except that the people engaged in maritime service are American citizens and are properly paid, decently treated, and in time of war are suitable for naval service.

This law of enforcing virtual peonage certainly would not permit self-respecting Americans to take up this occupation except as a last resort. We used to have a bondage system among white men in this country, in colonial times, and in other parts of the civilized world, but this bondage system is done away with in every employment except employment on the sea. We who are anxious to have an American marine built up and are anxious to have cheapened commerce do not want this cheapened commerce to be effected at the expense of human liberty. Such cheapening will always be dearly paid for. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with my remarks some telegrams that I have received from the Fishermen's Union of California; the California State Federation of Labor, representing some 65,000 men and women; the California Harbor Board of Fifteen; the Sailors' Union of the Pacific Coast; and the Marine Cooks and Stewards' Association of the Pacific Coast; and also a statement by Mr. Andrew Furuseth in regard to House bill 11372, which is in substance the present bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I yield my remaining time back to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a very few minutes. The Republican national platform adopted at Chicago and the Democratic national platform adopted at Baltimore both declare in favor of the repeal of our laws providing for the arrest of deserters from ships, whether domestic or foreign. While these laws may not be in violation of the letter of the Constitution, which prohibits involuntary servitude, they are in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and hence no liberty-loving man, no one who has respect for human rights, in the sunlight of this century can stand up and insist that a man shall be imprisoned for violation of the terms of a civil contract.

A bill has already passed the Senate (S. 5757) abolishing the penalty of imprisonment for desertion of seamen from vessels of the United States, whether in the coastwise trade or in foreign trade, and that bill is now pending before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The bill pending, known as the seamen's bill, contains a like provision and also provides for the abrogation of the treaties into which we have entered with foreign countries by the terms of which we are under obligation to return foreign seamen who desert from foreign ships in our ports.

If it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, if it is contrary to the sentiment of the times, there is no reason why we should perform this service for foreign nations if it is obnoxious to our views of our duty to our own shipping interests.

The other day when the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] was addressing the House he called attention to a provision of this bill on page 13, subdivision (e).

(e) That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for similar violation.

Section 10 of the pending bill is an amendment of the act of December 21, 1898, relating to the advances and allotment of wages. If the gentleman had only taken the pains to examine the statute, he would have found that instead of the paragraph quoted being a new provision it copies from the law the exact provision of the act of December 21, 1898, which provides in subdivision (f) as follows:

That this section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States, and any master, owner, consignee, or agent of any foreign vessel who has violated its provisions shall be liable to the same penalty that the master, owner, or agent of a vessel of the United States would be for similar violation: Provided, That treaties in force between the United States and foreign nations do not conflict.

I have said that section 10 of the act of December 21, 1898, relates to advancement and allotment of wages. If we have any treaty with a foreign nation we should take the necessary steps to repeal the treaty. The provision of which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] complains is in the act of December 21, 1898, and is not a new provision in the pending bill, hence his criticism is without merit.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he thought this bill violated any treaty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. I say if the contention of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is correct, and it did violate the provisions of the treaty, then we should take steps to repeal the treaty.

Mr. MANN. That may be a matter of dispute, but I thought the gentleman himself said he thought it did.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MANN. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] to consume the balance of his time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Missouri intend to have more than one speech?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We will have but one other speech on this side. The balance of the time will be consumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is one of vital importance. There are many subjects before the country demanding legislation. No one is of greater importance than the rebuilding of our merchant marine and regaining our commercial independence, put to hazard and lost by the War of the Civil Rebellion. Since that time our merchant marine, so far as it relates to transoceanic commerce, has been in a state of decadence. Agriculture, manufacture, and commerce are interests of great national importance; but commerce includes navigation, and it can not be conducted without it. All of these great factors are essential to the public weal, and none should be suffering for legislative aid.

Since the close of the Civil War a course has been pursued by indifferent captains commanding the ship of state which has resulted in great national loss and disadvantage, so that now, while we excel in agriculture and manufactures in the ports and marts of the world, we are practically devoid of a merchant marine, except in our coastwise trade. By proper navigation laws we have amply provided for our coastwise trade, and its commerce is carried exclusively in American bottoms.

But why should we not have our share of the deep-sea commerce of the world? Every nation should have its own shipping to carry its own commerce, at the very least, not to say it would be most desirable to go further and assist in the carriage of other nations. To carry our own commerce in bottoms flying our own flag would give us a commercial independence that would be a very strong security for political freedom. It would bring to us an independence in trade relations we do not now enjoy. Our prosperity must always depend to a very large degree on freedom of industrial development. To be prosperous we must embrace equal opportunities with other nations in all industrial enterprises and place ourselves upon equal opportunities with them. For more than a half a century we have been dependent upon other nations almost exclusively in the deep-sea traffic. A nation that is dependent necessarily lacks in liberty and loses in opportunity and power. Its dependence compels it to submit to untold impositions, and subjects it to the voracious rapacity of rivals and extortions of commercial competitors. We are now so dependent since the decline of our merchant marine that more than 90 per cent of our foreign commerce is carried by foreign shipping. This is a deplorable situation respecting our foreign intercourse. If we were so unfortunate as to engage in war with any of the great powers, our ships engaged in foreign commerce would be inadequate for transport service. We are now in the sad plight of being unable to carry on foreign war or commerce for lack of shipping facilities. The goods we make are carried in foreign ships. The wares we buy abroad are brought to our ports under foreign flags. We can make and purchase goods and expend millions to provide docks, wharves, and safe harbors; we can place a light upon every point that juts into the ocean on our thousands of miles of coast as signals of danger; we can erect a chain of radiotelegraphic stations from Penobscot to Brownsville and from San Diego to the Arctic Circle; and do all this for the use and benefit of foreign craft engaged in carrying our merchandise to foreign markets and bringing foreign goods to our shores. These public utilities are valuable aids to our coastwise shipping, which is amply protected by our navigation laws, and we should place ourselves in a position to enjoy their benefits by an adequate American deep-sea merchant marine. Congress should stimulate the sentiment in favor of an American merchant marine and in favor of a policy which will make the American flag more often seen in all of the ports of the world. It is the universal regret of Americans traveling abroad that the flag is not more often seen in the foreign carrying trade.

The pending measure, known as the seamen's bill, is one of the several measures proposed to restore the flag in the great carrying trade upon the high seas; it is a measure intended in some degree to restore our lost prestige in this branch of the world's commerce and to uplift our merchant marine. There are other measures pending having in view the same purport—the bill to regulate radio communication and the free-ship bill.

The bill under consideration has three main features. It is proposed to elevate the condition of the seaman in all the branches of the service so as to induce the American boy to go to sea, a condition most devoutly desired to be consummated. The restrictions surrounding the seaman, some of them originating in feudal times, contained in our navigation laws are so intolerable that Americans, except in our coastwise trade, have quit the sea. To eliminate some of these restrictions, to make the life of the seaman conform more nearly to modern civilization, to make the conditions of life on land and sea more nearly equal, is sought to be effected by the pending bill. No one will deny that the American seaman does not receive at the hands of existing law the treatment that men ashore expect, demand, and receive. We must modernize our navigation laws and make them accord with existing conditions and bring them within the American conception of personal liberty.

The condition of the seaman must be lifted from that which he now occupies, a serf tied to the ship. Under existing law he can be arrested and put in irons for deserting the ship, when such desertion amounts only to a breach of his contract. On shore such infraction is remedied by civil action for damages only. On sea the breach is penalized and the poor sailor is often put in irons at the mere whim of the master.

The right of the master to "flog" a seaman for disobedience to orders is a relic of the dark ages, and is nowhere tolerated on shore. No vessel engaged in the ocean-going trade should, not only for the safety of the passengers but for the safety of the crew as well, be permitted to clear a port without a sufficient crew for her safe navigation. The crew should be wholly efficient. The great trans Atlantic and Pacific steamships, floating palaces of the sea, equipped in luxuriance and with a lavish hand, to accommodate the elegant tastes and refinements of elite passengers, should be provided with suitable quarters for the comfort of those who are responsible for their safe navigation. Let me give you a concrete example. I call your attention to the existing law which provides for the quarters of the sailors and firemen in the forecastle. It is the place provided for them in which to live, eat, and sleep when off duty. This space is 6 feet long, 6 feet high, and 2 feet wide. Custom has placed the small bunk in this small place. Space is valuable for storing cargo, for swimming pool, and the dance pavilion. The space allotted to the sailor or fireman is sacrificed for the luxuriant quarters of officers and passengers, and is so uncomfortable that one of the witnesses before the committee described it "as too large for a coffin and too small for a grave." The forecastle is so limited in space that it has been dubbed "the glory hole." The law is an inheritance of olden times and should be discarded as quickly as possible.

The bill under consideration provides 100 cubic feet of space, room enough to stand up, lie down, and turn around. The marine architects, in their eager desire to excel in luxuriance, have entirely overlooked the comfort and welfare of the crew and the salient fact that they have intrusted to their care precious freight of human lives.

Most maritime nations of Europe have made the forecastle space 6 feet by 6 feet by 3 feet, 108 cubic feet.

The bill under consideration provides for suitable washing outfits and for suitable space for the crew to pass from the forecastle to the decks; it provides that the sailors shall be divided into two and the firemen into three watches, and that each watch shall alternately perform the work ordinarily incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; that while in safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sunday or legal holiday; that the seaman engaged in coastwise trade shall be paid his wages within two days after his discharge or termination of his services under the ship's articles; and in the transoceanic service within 24 hours after the cargo has been discharged; he will be entitled to receive one-half the wages due him at every port where the vessel takes on or discharges cargo; when the voyage is ended he will be entitled to his full pay. If the vessel while in a foreign port is in an unsuitable condition to go to sea on account of leakage or a lack of suitable equipment or men to properly man her, a majority of the crew can procure redress through the resident consul. He can compel his lodging place in the vessel to be properly lighted, heated, drained, ventilated, and protected from weather and sea and shut off from effluvium or cargo or bilge water; he need not be flogged, and all forms of corporal punishment are abolished; he is prohibited from receiving his wages in advance; no one except grandparent, parents, wife, sister, or children can take from him an allotment of his wages. This latter is a strike at the so-called advances for board of seamen while waiting in port for the vessel to take on cargo and depart, and has been subject to great abuses. The system was abolished in our coastwise trade by an act of the Congress in 1898.

If we enact this bill into law, the seaman's wages will be exempt from attachment or arrestment in any court. Nearly every State in the Union has exempted the wages of labor from attachment or execution. Some States have limited the amount that shall be exempt, and some have limited the time in which wages may be attached. In this provision we are simply following the humane policy recognized almost universally in favor of the wage earner in the land. Is a seaman entitled to any less consideration than the landsman? His life is filled with the monotony of the sea; his environments are encompassed by the waters; and his labors are full of drudgery.

The bill provides further for the proper manning of the vessel in that 75 per cent of the deck crew shall be able seamen. An able seaman is one who has had three years' service at sea. This provision will add to the efficiency of the service and inure to the safety of the crew and passengers.

Every vessel of 300 registered tons and less than 1,500 tons will be compelled to carry in her crew an American boy, and if more than 1,500 tons register two American boys. Ninety-five per cent of the crews of vessels engaged in deep-sea traffic that fly the American flag are foreigners. Before the decadence of our merchant marine the decks of our vessels teemed with native seamen. To restore this condition is one of the objects of the bill.

A new feature to American maritime law is proposed, to the effect that in the end not less than 75 per cent of the crew of a vessel shall be able to understand any order given by the officers of the vessel. All of these provisions are for the purpose of adding to the efficiency of the crew; to provide additional safeguards for the safety of passengers; to make life at sea more comfortable and endurable; to induce the American boy to enter the seafaring life, and to cause the American seaman when once in the service to remain there, that in the end we may rescue our decadent merchant marine from the said plight into which it has fallen.

If we can compel better quarters for our seamen; establish "watch for watch," so as to furnish requisite rest; prohibit "crimping"; prevent our seafaring men from being "placed in irons" for the mere breach of a contract, and thereby place him upon an equality with laborers on the soil; compel the foreigners to acquire our language so as to correctly understand orders given in English; require 75 per cent of the crews to be able seamen; enforce the apprenticeship of American boys upon our vessels, we certainly have taken a step forward in the advancement of our merchant marine and made life more easy for those citizens engaged in its perils.

As I said before, the bill has three main features:

The second feature has for its object the improvement in safety of life and property at sea. These features of the bill I have already pointed out in detail.

On the 15th of June, 1904, the excursion boat General Slocum, plying the waters of New York Harbor and Long Island Sound, was burned to the water's edge. More than a thousand men, women, and children lost their lives in the frightful holocaust. It was one of the most terrible marine tragedies of all time. In the confusion following the breaking out of the fire hundreds of men, women, and children, caught like rats in a trap, in the great tumult and pandemonium that reigned supreme, were burned to a crisp aboard ship. Hundreds of others, burned and scorched until frantic, rushed into the surrounding water, only to meet death by drowning. The scenes of that terrible marine tragedy are too horrible even at this late day to contemplate, and its horrors will never be forgotten. The memory can not efface the frightful scenes that ensued while the excursion steamer was being consumed by the flames. Its sickening details leaves a lasting impression upon the memory and they can not be forgotten. So terrible were the scenes there enacted that some of the victims who escaped lost their reason and have been compelled to spend their remaining days in asylums. And what was the cause? Above all others was the inefficiency of the crew. They were raw deck hands not drilled in the use of the fire apparatus. In that critical moment they knew nothing only to save themselves. The life preservers were wholly worthless, having been permitted to decay. The fire apparatus was rotten and useless. Who can say that if the Slocum had been manned with an efficient crew, these life preservers and the fire extinguishers would have been properly looked after and cared for and replaced with those in perfect working order, that if the crew had been such as we seek to provide for in this bill that, instead of trying to save themselves, they might have extinguished the fire that tolled so many precious lives and have prevented one of the most heartrending events of all history.

We appointed a commission to inquire into the causes of the Slocum tragedy. There was an actual loss of 955 out of 1,358 passengers, while there was only a loss of 2 out of a crew of 30. The commission reported:

> The inefficiency and poor quality of the crew of this vessel, doubtless typical of the majority of crews on excursion boats, is one of the essential facts that caused the loss of so many lives.

Upon the language requirements of the bill I want to call attention to the loss of the City of Rio de Janeiro. She carried a crew of 84 Chinamen and was officered by white men. But two of these officers could speak the language of the Chinese. The steamship was homeward bound from Hongkong to San Francisco. Upon entering the bay at San Francisco, on February 22, 1901, she struck a shoal of rocks between the Golden Gate and the harbor and sank within 20 minutes, carrying down a large number of passengers and crew, with her cargo. She entered the harbor in a dense fog; it was very dark, but the water was smooth. She carried 214 persons and 11 lifeboats. Her equipment and apparatus were in good condition. Five minutes would have been ample time to have loaded and lowered her boats, yet but only 3 of the 11 boats were lowered into the water, and only three passengers were taken aboard any of the boats. The boatswain and two firemen were the only two officers who could give orders in the Chinese language to the crew. The result was that the orders of the officers had to be communicated by the boatswain or by the chief fireman by signs or signals. It was utterly impossible for two officers to communicate with the crew in the emergency. The crew was not drilled in the matter of lowering boats, and under these conditions all were practically helpless. The United States Supreme Court held—> that the ship was insufficiently manned, for the reason that the sailors were unable to understand and execute the orders made imperative by the exigency that unhappily arose and resulted so disastrously to life, as well as to property.

Had 75 per cent of the crew been able to understand the English language there was ample time to have filled and lowered the boats and thus have prevented the frightful and criminal loss of life.

The Titanic disaster is too recent to dwell upon its terrible results. She carried on board on her initial trip 2,223 persons, of whom 1,515 were lost and only 706 saved. Her crew numbered 899 persons.

The evidence before the Committee on Commerce in the United States Senate discloses that she was equipped with 16 lifeboats and 4 collapsible, with a total capacity of 1,176 persons. The crew had never been drilled in the handling of davits or lowering of the boats. It is not clear that all of the lifeboats were loaded and lowered, one of the lifeboats being unaccounted for. More than four hours elapsed from the time the Titanic received her death blow before she sank, and no one would question the fact that she had ample time in which to lower all of her boats and properly load them, but the evidence discloses that there was great indecision among the crew; they did not seem to know how many were necessary to man each boat, and there was a failure to utilize all lifeboats to the capacity for safety. Only 706 were taken off. A very few of the lifeboats were overloaded, while many of them were only partially filled. Proper efficiency in the crew of the Titanic might have saved 474 souls. This, the greatest of all marine tragedies, exemplifies the necessity for strict laws and regulations in regard to promoting the safety of passengers and crew at sea.

We might multiply these illustrations, but it is useless. It may be said that these examples are noted exceptions, but I want to call attention to the fact that in the fiscal year of 1910 there were loss of life upon 262 American vessels, entailing a loss of 563 lives. These vessels either foundered, stranded, were in collisions, or there was loss of life from other causes, and the sum total might be charged up to inefficiency.

As the law now stands the shipowner can go into the mountains of Pennsylvania and hire men wholly without experience and intermingle them with men who have been to sea long enough to absorb some of the ethics and traditions of the calling. And this or the like is not infrequently done. And then we exploit about "the safety of the sea" and overlook entirely the efficiency of the crew.

This bill is not opposed to the interests of the shipowner. The decadence of our over-sea carrying trade is due to two causes.

We can not build ships in this country as cheap as they can be constructed in the foreign yards. The cost of ships is, then, an item in favor of the foreign shipowner, and in order to put the domestic owner upon an equal footing with his foreign competitor we must equalize this difference in cost. How are we to accomplish this? One of the bills now pending upon the House Calendar is the free-ship bill. Outside the difference of wages between the foreign and domestic yards, we can furnish cheaper materials to our shipbuilders than the foreign yards can obtain them for. It is proposed to give free material for the construction of ships to our builders and in that way equalize the cost to the American owner. Can anyone doubt that the means to be employed will not justify the ends sought to be accomplished? With free material to enter into the construction of domestic ships our shipbuilders will undoubtedly be compensated for the difference in wages here and abroad. Solve the wage problem, and we should be able to purchase ships in our own yards cheaper than to take them off of foreign ways.

The second obstacle to be overcome is the difference in wages of an American crew and the wages of the foreign crew. The cost of victualing the ship is as cheap or cheaper here than abroad. Fuel is as accessible and no greater burden. How, then, are we to equalize the wage problem? It must not be forgotten that the American seaman is more capable and more efficient than his foreign competitor. He can and does accomplish more in a given time, and this is a factor in the problem of equalization. This bill seeks to abrogate the treaties and laws under which seamen on foreign vessels are imprisoned in the United States at the behest of the masters of those vessels. The master, as the law now stands, has a sort of peonage upon the members of his crew. He can throw them in prison and keep them in bondage until ready to depart, and then compel their return to his ship. By this barbarous process he is enabled to enforce obedience to the ship's articles and retains his crew for the round trip. Under such a law the seaman is not the owner of his body but is a slave to the ship. Abolish the law, and the foreign seaman when he lands in our ports can refuse to return unless he is paid the price of an American seaman. The master can not return without men to safely navigate his ship. He is in an American port, and before he can return he must engage his crew in the American market and at its wage. No one will question but that he will be obliged to pay the wages demanded by American freemen. The foreign seaman can require the American wage or refuse to make the return voyage. Can anyone doubt but that these conditions will equalize the scale of wages? The American shipbuilder, with his free materials selling upon an equality with his foreign competitor, the owner navigating his vessel on an equality with his foreign competitor, we should soon expect to find the American boy coming back to the sea instead of drifting from the sea; we should soon expect to see our merchant marine rejuvenated, plowing every sea in every clime and the flag of freedom waving in every commercial mart and port in the world.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 38 minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to discuss the statements contained in the views of the minority to any great extent that this is the first time in recent years that partisan advantage has been sought on any bill before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries by a subcommittee excluding the minority of the committee from the consideration of the bill while it was being perfected. It is immaterial to the merits of this bill whether or not the friends of the measure met for the purpose of considering it before presenting it to the opposition for the purpose of consideration. As a matter of fact, the friends of the bill did meet and perfect the bill. It was then submitted to a subcommittee for its consideration, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] was not present at that meeting. His absence was no fault of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who was chairman of the subcommittee. The bill was referred to the full committee for consideration. The gentleman from Washington was present at that meeting and stated at that meeting that he had not had an opportunity to consider the measure and asked that it go over until the next meeting of the committee so that he could have an opportunity of presenting his views. His request was complied with and the bill went over until the next meeting of the committee, when the gentleman from Washington was again present, stated briefly his views upon the measure, and afterwards the bill was considered and reported to this House. The bill is not a partisan measure, as is demonstrated by the fact that both of the great political parties have in their platforms adopted resolutions indorsing the principles involved in the bill. The Republican platform, under the head of "Safety at sea," says:

> We favor the speedy enactment of laws to provide that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude and that life and property at sea shall be safeguarded by the ample equipment of vessels with life-saving appliances, and that full complements of skilled, able-bodied seamen be provided for.

So that there is more in the Republican platform than the simple declaration of freedom for the sailor. They seem to believe that among the things necessary for safety at sea is skilled seamen to handle a sufficient number of lifeboats to protect those who travel by sea.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman now if he will join with me in any amendment I may offer that will compel the employment of men who are competent and able to handle lifeboats and other crafts used in the saving of life at sea?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would have to wait until I hear the amendments before answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If, in the judgment of the gentleman, it increased efficiency——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If, in my judgment, it increased the safety of travel at sea, I would be perfectly willing to agree to amendments of that character.

The Democratic platform, under the heading of "Merchant marine," says:

> We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics at the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury. We urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of laws for the greater security of life and property at sea, and we favor the repeal of all laws and the abrogation of so much of our treaties with other nations as to provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen charged with desertion and with violation of their contracts of service. Such laws and treaties are un-American and violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

Both party platforms declare in favor of the principles embodied in this bill. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] says that it was not shown in the Titanic disaster that the seamen employed on the Titanic were lacking in skill. Let me quote from a statement issued by some of the survivors immediately after the Titanic disaster. They said:

> We feel it our duty to call the attention of the public to what we consider the inadequate supply of life-saving appliances provided for on modern passenger steamships, and recommend that immediate steps be taken to compel passenger steamers to carry sufficient boats to accommodate the maximum number of people carried on board. The following facts were observed and should be considered in this connection: The insufficiency of lifeboats, rafts, etc.; lack of trained seamen to man the same. Stokers, stewards, etc., are not efficient boat handlers. Not enough officers to carry out emergency orders on the bridge and superintend the launching and control of lifeboats; absence of searchlights,

And so forth.

In the reports made by the Senate committee and by the British committee that investigated the subject, similar statements are made. The statement on the part of the Senate committee embodied, in brief, this fact: That the Titanic crew was but meagerly acquainted with the positions and duties in case of accident. Lord Mersey's committee reported that a greater proportion of the passengers might have been saved if the crew had been better organized and trained in the handling and launching of lifeboats. Both of those reports specify the necessity for skilled men in handling lifeboats. Of what value is it in the saving of life at sea to have a sufficient number of boats to hold every person on board, passengers and crew, if, after you have those lifeboats, you have not a sufficient number of men skilled in the handling of boats to lower them and get off in a seaway.

This bill will accomplish three very important results. It will give freedom to the sailor. It will promote safety of travel at sea. It will assist very materially in the building up of a merchant marine without resorting to subsidies by equailzing the operating expenses of our vessels engaged in the foreign trade with those of foreign competitors.

There are two great reasons why our merchant marine has declined. The first of those is that the initial cost of vessels to the American shipowner is greater than the initial cost of vessels to his competitor. A bill is now pending on the calendar, introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], proposing to remedy that portion of the discrimination against our merchant marine. The other reason is that the operating expenses of American vessels engaged in the foreign trade is greater than the operating expenses of competing vessels. Those increased operating expenses are principally, if not wholly, composed of the difference in the wage rate paid to American seamen as compared with the wage rate paid to foreign seamen. When it comes to buying supplies for our vessels they are able to buy their supplies as cheaply as their competitors can buy them. They buy them in the same ports, in the same markets, under the same conditions, and consequently are able to buy their supplies as cheaply as their competitors are able to buy them. But it is not true with regard to wages. There has been a very common misapprehension that the wages are dependent to a great extent, if not wholly, upon the flag under which a sailor works. But the wages are dependent principally upon the wages in the ports at which the sailor is shipped, and the wages in those ports are in turn dependent in a great measure upon the standard of living in the country where the port is located. And so foreign vessels have been able to procure their seamen in their home ports at a lower rate than our merchant marine is able to secure them. And after having secured those seamen at a lower rate and the seamen have signed the ship's articles if they desert when they come to our ports we use our police powers to catch those seamen and return them to the vessels from which they deserted, thereby using our police powers for the purpose of assisting foreign countries in continuing their advantage over our own merchant marine.

The wages of American seamen until recently out of the port of New York for British ports were $25 per month. They are now $30 per month. The wages of British able seamen to the port of New York were £4 10s. They are now £5 per month.

(For wages of American seamen, see p. 95, Annual Report of Commissioner of Navigation, 1911.)

(For wages of British seamen, see S. Doc. No. 379, 2d sess. 61st Cong., p. 34.)

There is the same or greater difference in the wages paid seamen out of the ports of other foreign countries compared with American ports as that existing between British ports and the port of New York.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr HUMPHREY] says that we have the power but we have not the right to interfere with that condition of affairs; that we have not the right to say to foreign nations what qualifications their seamen shall have, what contracts those seamen shall make, what language those seamen shall speak, or the other conditions and terms under which the contract shall be made. We not only have the right, we not only have the power, but it is our duty to our citizens who travel on those vessels which come to our ports, whose safety is involved, whose property is risked, to see to it, as far as our jurisdiction and power go, that they shall travel in safety and their property be transported safely. We do not say, or propose to say, to foreign nations what the terms and conditions of their contracts with seamen shall be as long as they remain in foreign waters; but just as soon as they come into American waters, then we insist that they shall comply with the same regulations, the same provisions for safety, as are required of American vessels.

Most foreign vessels entering our ports carry our citizens as passengers and our merchandise as freight, and it is not only our moral right but our moral duty to see that both are carried in safety. That can not be done if the seamen do not understand the language of the officers. No man can obey orders or follow instructions that does not understand the orders or instructions when given to him, and no man can be efficient as a seaman in ordinary times, and much less in times of emergency, who does not understand orders when given him. But even that is not sufficient. Of what value is it to understand orders when given if the seaman has not sufficient skill to carry the orders into effect? Of what value is it to have a sufficient number of lifeboats to carry all of the passengers and crew if you have not a sufficient number of skilled men to lower them and handle them in a seaway?

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] further says that this slave-catching device—catching runaway seamen—is obsolete so far as American seamen are concerned. If it is obsolete, then there can be no objection whatever to the repeal of the law. But, unfortunately, it is not obsolete. The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1910, says:

> In fact, in foreign ports where imprisonment is still permitted by our law, last year American consuls reported only eight arrests. One seaman was arrested and returned to his ship at Tahiti, Society Islands; two at Hakodate, Japan; three at Manila, Philippine Islands; one at Port Elizabeth, Cape of Good Hope; one at Montevideo, Uruguay.

Eight of them arrested and imprisoned—American seamen, American citizens—treated as runaway slaves in a foreign country, captured by the police powers of foreign countries, imprisoned or returned to their vessels, and compelled to fulfill a civil contract to labor.

Since when, Mr. Speaker, has it become wrong for the American people to stand out against a fugitive-slave law? Since when has it become wrong for the American people to stand out against slavery in any form? The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Bailey against The State of Alabama (219 U. S., p. 219), used this language:

> While its immediate concern was African slavery, the thirteenth amendment was a charter of universal freedom of all citizens, of whatever race, color, or estate, under the flag. The words "involuntary servitude" have a larger meaning than slavery, and the thirteenth amendment prohibited all control, by coercion, of the personal service of one man for the benefit of another.

And yet under our existing maritime laws a seaman can be compelled to work against his will for the personal benefit and profit of another. That is also true, and to a greater extent true, of foreign seamen in vessels trading with the United States. A short time ago my attention was called to an article in the Coast Seamen's Journal, asserting that certain men had been arrested and were held by the United States marshal, to be placed aboard of a vessel which they had left. I immediately sent the following telegram, under the date of May 22 of this year:

> Hon. CHARLES T. ELLIOT,
> United States Marshal, San Francisco, Cal.:
> Please advise me by wire what disposition has been made of Thorwald Bye, Harold P. Ellison, and John S. Johnson, from the Norwegian steamer Admiralen, and whether or not they are still being held in the custody of the United States, to be delivered to said steamer.

To which I received on the same date the following reply:

> Telegram received. Parties placed in charge of officer, steamer Admiralen, May 11, by request Norwegian consulate.

That is evidence that these laws have not become obsolete. They still exist, as applied to foreign seamen trading at our ports and our seamen at foreign ports.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. HOWLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not the law to which he is now calling attention has ever been applied to seamen on the Great Lakes, and whether the gentleman knows of a case where an arrest for desertion has ever been asked for on the Great Lakes?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have not any information of any arrests having been made on the Great Lakes under these circumstances; but if they have not, and the law is obsolete so far as it applies to the Great Lakes, then there certainly can be no reason why the law should not be repealed.

Mr. HOWLAND. I understand it has been abolished, and so the remarks of the gentleman in this respect would not apply to the Great Lakes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It would not apply generally to the Great Lakes, because the traffic on the Great Lakes is not to any great extent a foreign traffic. The greater part of the traffic on the Great Lakes is a coastwise traffic, and, so far as the coastwise trade is concerned, the law was repealed a number of years ago—in 1898, I believe.

Mr. HOWLAND. We are very proud of our ships and sailors on the Lakes and I would like to ask the gentleman this general question, as to whether or not the evils against which he is proposing to legislate in the pending measure are in existence at the present time on the Great Lakes?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not know, so far as the freedom of the sailor is concerned, but I do know that on the Great Lakes at the present time unskilled men are employed in handling vessels, and that, as a result of unskilled men being employed, life and property are continuously in danger.

On the question of skill I desire to call the attention of the House to a colloquy which occurred during the hearing before the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will it disturb the gentleman if I ask him a question? I do not want to annoy the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Not at all. Go ahead.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think I ought to ask this question of the gentleman in justice to the Great Lakes traffic to which he referred: Is it not a fact that the evidence as introduced before our committee shows, so far as the Great Lakes are concerned, that in the last two or three years the loss of life has been less than three in a million, or safer than it was anywhere on land?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The loss of life has been comparatively small on the Great Lakes, but the loss of property has been heavy. There have been quite a number of very important vessels, heavily laden, that have gone to the bottom on the Great Lakes. The traffic on the Great Lakes is principally a freight traffic.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a further question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOWLAND. Is it not a fact that the involuntary servitude, of which the gentlemen speaks is no longer in force on the Great Lakes?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. So far as the coastwise trade is concerned, it is no longer enforced anywhere in the United States. It is only so far as our foreign trade is concerned, so far as our ocean-going commerce is concerned, and that on foreign vessels in our ports, that involuntary servitude still continues.

Mr. HOWLAND. Then really the only effect that the gentleman is striving to accomplish by this legislation, with reference to the Great Lakes, is the employment of what he terms skilled seamen in the Great Lakes service?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is one of the purposes that is sought, and it is also sought to change the law so that it can not be used to impose slavery on the seamen on the Great Lakes. It might be used now, although it is not used. It is sought to change it so that it can not be used to compel workmen to engage in service that is distasteful to them, or continue in it after they desire to leave that service.

Mr. HOWLAND. Would not the gentleman be willing, under these circumstances, to accept an amendment exempting the Great Lakes from the operation of this bill, which he admits does not in many respects apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; I would not agree to an amendment of that kind. In fact, I would oppose it. It is well known that in times of storm the Great Lakes are as dangerous as the ocean, and there is just as much necessity for skill in handling vessels on the Great Lakes as there is on the ocean; and for that reason, if for no other, I would be opposed to any amendment like that suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOWLAND. We all agree to the proposition, of course, which has just been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not want to trespass upon his time, but I deny that any substantial number of our seamen in the Lake service are unskilled seamen, and the record of loss of life and property on the Great Lakes substantiates my statement.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield to the gentleman if he will proceed with his question without taking up the time for explanations.

Mr. HOWLAND. I am very much interested in the gentleman's definition of involuntary servitude with reference to contracts for personal labor. Does the gentleman go to the extent of holding that a contract for personal labor is involuntary servitude?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I go to the extent of saying that whenever any person makes a contract to perform labor, and after having made that contract desires to cease those labors, if you compel him to continue them that constitutes involuntary servitude; and this fact stands out, that if you can by law compel a man to work for one second after he desires to cease working, then you can compel him to make a contract to work for his entire lifetime by virtue of his necessities. And that would give you not only a brief period of involuntary servitude, but a lifetime of involuntary servitude.

Mr. HOWLAND. Just one other question. Under the gentleman's definition of involuntary servitude, would he hold that where there is existing a contract for the period of six months for personal services, and at the end of three months the man who is hired desires to quit his employment and does so, and there is a balance due him on his contract for personal services, the employer should not have the right, for breach of that contract, to a counterclaim on the amount due for breach of the contract?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The employer would not have the right to withhold the wages that are due, but would have the right to sue the man in the civil courts and to recover such damages as the court should award, and collect them as other judgments are collected.

Mr. HOWLAND. I am assuming, of course, that the laborer has sued on his contract to recover the balance of wages due him for three months' service where the contract is for six months' service. Suppose there is a small amount due him. The employer comes into court and sets up a counterclaim that he has been damaged by the breach of the contract. Would the gentleman hold that the counterclaim under those circumstances should be void in law?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would hold that the subject matter of the damages done would be purely within the jurisdiction of the court to determine, but there would be no right on the part of the employer to compel the individual workman to continue his service.

Mr. HOWLAND. My question did not relate to that. Specific performance of a contract for personal service has never been allowed in the civil courts, not having maritime jurisdiction.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Labor is a part of the man himself, and you can not control that power to labor without controlling the man; and when you control the man against his will it is involuntary servitude.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that in several places in this bill you specifically take away from a sailor the right to contract.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. We do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do you not to that extent, then, take away from him the power to sell his labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. We take away from him the power to contract, because that power to contract has been used by the shipowners as a means of oppression of the sailor. The sailor has been looked upon as being one of the wards of the Nation, and it is one of our duties to see that he is protected against any unfair and unjust discrimination in the making of contracts.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, without implying by the question any agreement or disagreement with the gentleman's views, I want to ask him this: If you are going to protect the sailor, as the gentleman says, from certain contracts made with the shipowner—and I am free to say that I think he ought to be in a great many particulars, and have no dispute with the gentleman about that, and that being true and recognizing him as he always has been recognized as a ward of the Nation—does the gentleman not think that we ought also to compel him, where it is just, to carry out his contracts? Does the gentleman not think that he ought to be a ward both ways?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman puts in the qualification of its being just, of course I could agree with him, but it is a very general term, and the question would naturally arise, Where is it just? Is it just to allow crimps to bleed him? Is it just to allow him to be imposed upon on shipboard and to have no opportunity of leaving the service until he gets back to the port from which he sailed?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I admit that all things should protect him from the crimp. I will go as far as the gentleman will on that. I live on the seacoast and I know some of the evils. But why should you take away from the sailor the power to make a contract on the Great Lakes which he should sign for the round trip, and not demand his wages until he gets back?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, practically the same conditions exist on the Great Lakes as on the seacoast. The colloquy which I was about to quote from the hearings on the seamen's bill occurred between Mr. H. D. Golder, attorney for the Lake Carriers' Association, and myself, and is found on pages 237 and 238 of the hearings, and is as follows:

Mr. WILSON. Doesn't the association also set up a standard of efficiency for able seamen and ordinary seamen, etc.?

Mr. GOLDER. No; they have not attempted to fix any standard. They have not attempted to do that other than in this way. They have left that with their officers, who are very anxious, of course, and always anxious to have good, efficient men to perform their duties. The engineer wants efficient assistants, and so the policy of the Lake Carriers' Association has been to let the chief engineer determine his own help. Of course not absolutely, but it would be a rare thing, I think, to go in any of the ships on the Lakes and see a first or a second assistant, or a third, or an oiler on board a ship who was not satisfactory to the chief engineer.

Mr. WILSON. Doesn't the association issue certificates of ascertained fitness?

Mr. GOLDER. No; they issue simply a book. They did issue a certificate certifying that upon the best information that a man was competent for a certain kind of work. They would not employ a man and never do, but they would give that certificate of ascertained competency to their members as the best information that they could get about it. It is up to the officer in charge to try and get as good men as he can.

Mr. WILSON. That was presented for the purpose of enabling the different shipmasters to determine the fitness of a particular man for the position that he was to be employed for?

Mr. GOLDER. Well, it was merely to enable them to give the best information to the members that they could. They did that, and that was all there was of it.

Mr. WILSON. If it was deemed necessary for the Lake Carriers' Association to find out the fitness of the men for the various positions in order to promote the welfare of the business, what objection can there be to the law requiring that that fitness shall be ascertained?

Mr. GOLDER. Ethically and theoretically there isn't a shadow of objection to it. Practically, it would be a very great burden on your inspectors. You would have to increase the inspection service very much, and my chief objection to that is, I wouldn't care much about it myself, but my personal opinion from observation and knowledge of the subject is that I should object to putting that expense upon the Government, because I do not think that the Government can get any proper and adequate return for its money.

Thus it will be seen that the shipowners themselves realize the necessity of some standard of efficiency for seamen on the Great Lakes. They admit that it is ethically and theoretically right that the law should require that the fitness of seamen for their respective positions shall be ascertained.

The only objection is that of the expense which it would be to the Government.

This bill has been drawn with a view to determining the fitness of seamen, based upon three years' service on deck at sea under regulations which will not materially increase the present cost of inspection.

It has been suggested in this debate that the deck crews are not the only ones employed on board of vessels who may be skilled in handling a lifeboat, and that is true. Here and there may be found a man in some of the departments, or even a passenger, who may be skilled in handling a lifeboat and who would be of some service in the event of an accident necessitating the lowering of boats.

The men employed on a vessel are divided into three separate departments, each having duties peculiar to itself—the steward's department, the engineer's department, and the deck department.

Neither the steward's nor the engineer's department have to do with the navigation of the vessel. That belongs to the deck department, and there is where skill for navigation purposes should be required and found.

It is not the duty of a waiter or a cook, a passer, a fireman, or an engineer to see to the safe navigation of a vessel; it is the duty of the deck department.

It is an old saying and a true one, "That what is everybody's business is nobody's business." The department whose duty it is to navigate the vessel should be required to have a sufficient amount of skill to perform their duties and handle the vessel safely.

This bill provides a standard of efficiency for the deck crew based upon three years' experience on deck, and requires that for the first year after the passage of this act the number of skilled men shall not be less than 40 per cent of the deck crew and increases the number required at the rate of 5 per cent annually until it reaches a maximum of 65 per cent of skilled men in the deck crew. It further provides that in any event the number of skilled men in the deck department shall not be less than two for each lifeboat. Two skilled men is not all the crew that would be needed in a lifeboat. That is only a sufficient number to direct the lowering of the boat and to steer it when it gets away. It will require at least three times that number to properly man a lifeboat, and the additional number can readily be made up from the other two departments if need be. But those two departments should not be called upon or expected to furnish the skill necessary for the proper handling of the boat.

It has been contended in opposition to this bill that it is placing too much power in the hands of one man to permit him, by affidavits setting forth the fact that the law is not being complied with, to cause a muster of the crew of a vessel to be made. And it is contended by the gentleman from Washington that that might mean a delay of one or two days in dispatching a vessel. As a matter of fact, there is not a vessel afloat whose crew can not be mustered, their certificates of competency examined, and each member of it questioned to determine his language qualifications inside of three or four hours.

It should be remembered in discussing this part of the bill that no penalty is provided for any vessel failing to comply with this section other than that the crew may leave, or a collector of a port may detain it and refuse to give it clearance. To make it difficult under those circumstances to have a muster of the crew made would tend to destroy the purpose of the bill relative to the equalization of the operating expenses of foreign with domestic vessels. Every influence that any foreign country could exert would be utilized to prevent a muster of the crew being made, in order that they might continue to retain the commercial advantages they now have. This section is safeguarded by the fact that any man who makes a false affidavit for the purpose of detaining the vessel, through spite or other improper motive, would be liable to prosecution under the provisions of section 5392 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

> Every person who, having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed is true, willfully and contrary to such oath states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000, and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed.

Time and time again we have heard the statement made on this floor that the American flag is no longer found floating on the masthead of vessels in foreign ports. We have heard expressions of humiliation and shame because of this fact, and we have been urged to subsidize our foreign-going shipping in order to remedy the evil. Our export trade and our import trade is immense; to carry it or any considerable portion of it in American bottoms would require subsidies far beyond any amount the American people would stand for. The cause would still remain, requiring the continuation of the subsidy for an indefinite period.

If you want to build up your merchant marine, you must first make it as profitable for American capital to invest in shipping as it is for it to invest on land, and, second, make the conditions of life and employment at sea as favorable to the workmen as the conditions on land. When you have done these two things a merchant marine will be built up with American capital and an American personnel in the crew.

Give us this bill and the "free-ship bill" and you will have taken a great stride toward an American merchant marine. The seaman will be free, his condition will improve, and the American man and boy will seek a seafaring life in sufficient numbers to man all our vessels in peace or war. The commercial advantages which the foreign shipowner has had will be removed, American capital will find profitable investment at sea, and the American seaman, with his self-respect restored, will stand out as a model of seamanship to all the world.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and seventy-nine Members have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to arrest absentees, and bring them before the bar of the House, and that the Speaker be authorized to sign the necessary forms.

The motion was agreed to.

After several additional Members had answered to their names,

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-nine Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 76, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 6978) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and children of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1035).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6978) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1: This is the case of Gust Carlson (S. 428). In this case there is some question as to the incurrence of permanent disability in the service; but that the soldier is now in deplorable physical condition is vouched for by the Senator who is acquainted with the circumstances, and in view of those statements and the fact that the soldier was injured in the service, the House recedes from its amendment striking the item from the bill.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 5623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1034).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1: The amendment strikes from the bill the name of Anna Jones Banks (S. 4765). This is a case in which the Senate proposed to pension the widow of a soldier of the Indian wars who had not served 30 days. The House cut the item from the bill on the grounds that it has not been customary to pension widows of soldiers of the Indian wars who did not serve 30 days. The Senate agrees to the amendment.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I also call up the conference report on the bill (S. 6340) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1033).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6340) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1 (the case of Michael Grace, S. 782): In this case the evidence is not conclusive that soldier's disability is due to service, and the item was stricken from the bill by the House. The Senate agrees to the amendment of the House.

Amendment No. 2 (the case of Perry L. Sargent, S. 3825): The Senate proposed to increase the pension of soldier from $17 to $24 per month, based largely upon a disability incurred since his service. The House strikes the item from the bill and the Senate agrees to the amendment.

Amendment No. 3 (the case of Arthur W. S. Maw, S. 5345): This is the case of a soldier who had four terms of service in the Regular Army and who was discharged from the service on account of disability not due to service. There is some question as to incurrence of disability in line of duty and the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
WM. A. DICKSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1909, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the land of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes."

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1036).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the House amendment and agree to the same with the following amendment:

"Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death."

JNO. H. STEPHENS,
J. M. GUDGER, Jr.,
CHAS. H. BURKE,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The amendment of the House does not require conveyances by full bloods of inherited allotted land to be approved by the county court or anyone else.

The act of May 27, 1908, required the conveyance to be approved by the county court, and Senate bill 4948 as it passed the Senate also contains a similar provision to the one suggested herein requiring the conveyance before it should be valid to be approved by the court having jurisdiction of the estate of the deceased.

The necessity for the passage of this act, as will be shown by the report of the House committee as well as the Senate committee, is because the Attorney General of the United States has rendered an opinion holding that where the allottee died prior to May 27, 1908, although the conveyance was not made until after May 27, 1908, the deed would have to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the United States court for the eastern district of Oklahoma and the State's courts have held that the date of the death of the allottee was immaterial when the conveyance was not made until after the act of May 27, 1908, went into effect.

In other words, they held that the provision of the act of May 27, 1908, related to the date of the conveyance and not to the date of the death of the allottee, and this act is to clear up the question or controversy as to the date of the conveyance being approved by the county court.

The report (No. 549) of the House on the said Senate bill No. 4948 is further explanatory of the object and necessity for this legislation and is as follows:

[House Report No. 549, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION FROM LANDS OF ALLOTTEES OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. Carter, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate bill 4948:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of the allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes," having duly considered the same, reports the bill without amendment and recommends that it do pass.

Your committee adopts the report of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs on this bill, which is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 548, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

Your committee, having had under consideration Senate bill 4948, recommends that it pass.

By the act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 137), it was provided in section 22 that deeds of full-blood Indian heirs should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

By section 9 of the act of May 27, 1908, a new method was provided, as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 9. That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions upon the alienation of said allottee's land: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee."

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma has held that the fact of death, under the act of May 27, 1908, authorized the conveyance of any interest of any full-blood heir to be approved by the probate court of Oklahoma, and many deeds have been taken in accordance with this decision, regardless of whether the allottee died prior to May 27, 1908, or not.

The United States district court rendered a decision to the same effect in the case of Harris v. Gale (188 Fed., 712), and no appeal was taken from this decision, which was rendered June 29, 1911—nearly a year ago. Judge Campbell, the United States district judge, in his opinion, says:

"There being no conceivable reason why Congress should have intended to distinguish between conveyances by full-blood heirs of inherited lands made subsequent to the act of May 27, 1908, where the ancestor died prior to that date and where the ancestor died subsequent to that date, and the language of the act itself not so clearly evincing such an intention as to preclude the contrary construction, it is decided that by the said act any full-blood Indian heir of any deceased allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes is authorized to convey any interest in the lands inherited by him from such deceased allottee, upon approval thereof by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of such deceased allottee, whether such death occurred before or after May 27, 1908, and the approval of such conveyance by the Secretary of the Interior is not required. Of course, in cases where such heir is a minor, the procedure to secure the necessary order and approval of the court must be as in cases of other minors.

The reason for the necessity of this act is that the Interior Department, through the Attorney General, has held that in cases where the death of allottee occurred prior to May 27, 1908, title passing by deed to the heirs could only be valid with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under the act of 1906.

Both the Federal court and the State court having held to the contrary, it is necessary that this act should be passed for the purpose of removing the cloud from these titles.

For the reasons given the committee advises the immediate passage of this bill.

JNO. H. STEPHENS,
J. M. GUDGER, Jr.,
CHAS. H. BURKE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill, with a Senate amendment now proposed to be agreed to, entirely eliminates the control of the Indian Office from the sale of allottees' land covered by the provisions of the bill. When the bill was before the House the gentleman from Oklahoma, who is interested in the matter, made a suggestion, which was agreed to, and the Senate bill was passed with the suggestion by unanimous consent. Now comes a proposition from the Senate requiring that every sale shall be approved by the probate court, and it is not the intention to have those sales approved both by the probate court and the Indian Office. The original act provided that certain sales should be approved by the probate court. I want to know the reason for entirely eliminating the control of the Indian Office and the Secretary of the Interior over any of these sales.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that was done in the act of May 27, 1909.

Mr. MANN. If it is already done by an act, why is it now being done in another act by an amendment?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Attorney General held that this act only applied to deeds heretofore made for lands in this character of cases, and it is the intention of Congress, as evidenced by the decisions of the court, both of Oklahoma and the Federal courts in Oklahoma, that this should apply to both those heretofore and those hereafter made, and this language is placed in this bill so that it should apply to both classes of cases, and it is for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title of these lands that we prepared and put through this bill.

The words "heretofore and hereafter made" is the material change in law, so that it is made to apply to both classes of cases.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, all that the gentleman from Texas has said upon the subject now does not relate at all to the Senate amendment which it is now proposed to agree to, but relates to the original bill as it passed both the House and the Senate. Here was the bill we passed, and the Senate put on a certain proposition for the purpose of having certain sales confirmed by the county or probate court instead of the Secretary of the Interior. That was agreed to by the House—that bill and that proposition. Now, when that goes back to the Senate the Senate injects another proposition to require all sales of allottees to be approved by the probate court, and the gentleman has yet not referred to that Senate amendment or the reason for it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that that should be done, and that all sales of Indian lands of deceased Indians, when the Indian inheriting has made title, should be approved by the probate court of the county for the reason that the Indian dying in any of those counties is controlled by the probate court of that county. It is just the same probate law that applies to a white man's estate who dies, and whose estate becomes subject to the same rules and regulations as we provide by this bill for Indians.

Mr. MANN. I think the sales ought to be approved by some disinterested party, and in a great many cases it is a good deal safer to leave it with the Indian Office than it is with the judge of the probate court in Oklahoma. There have been cases in Oklahoma where it was known that the probate judge deliberately entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of swindling the Indians out of their property. The people have retired those judges, I believe, and now comes the proposition to provide that all Indian sales shall be confirmed by the probate court, going further than the original bill, and if it were intended to have that supplemental approval by the Indian Office I would not have any complaint to make, but it is intended to take the place of the approval by the Indian Office, as I understand it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is in error in stating that the Senate amended the bill. This is a Senate bill, and it came to the House——

Mr. MANN. Am I in error in saying this is a Senate amendment, this new proposition?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman certainly is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know to what he is referring.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just a moment and I will show whether I am or not. This is a Senate bill and the House amended it. The Senate disagreed to the amendment and asked for a conference.

Mr. MANN. That is right.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Senate receded from their disagreement to the amendment of the House with an amendment, and that was done in conference.

Mr. MANN. That is the amendment I am talking about.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, the reason for the amendment by the conferees was because, by the House amendment, it was thought that no approval was required either by the county court or the Interior Department, and it was thought that there ought to be some tribunal that would have to approve sales.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Senate having passed a bill for the express purpose of providing for an approval by the probate court and the House having passed a bill for the same purpose, that the conferees concluded that neither bill would cover that subject?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No. The House amended the bill. I do not remember in just what particular, but I was present in the Senate when the matter went to conference, and it was stated on the floor of the Senate that as the House had amended it, it did not require approval of either the county court or Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to quote what was done in the Senate, although I read all the debate on the subject. They propose to have inserted through the conferees an amendment which was offered in the Senate——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. MANN. An amendment which was offered in the Senate to require all the sales to be approved.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota (continuing). To the original purpose of the bill. For instance, there was an act passed, I think in 1906, and it provided that deeds of full-blood Indian heirs should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. That was the act of 1906, and by the act of May 27, 1908, the law was changed to the effect that the approval should be by the probate courts in Oklahoma. Now, it seems that in some opinion of some Federal official, I think the Attorney General, it was held that sales made where the allottee died prior to the 1908 act would have to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. But they were not covered by the act.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It caused a cloud upon titles where land had been conveyed. The courts held, as I understand it, contrary to the opinion of the Attorney General, and this act is simply to clear the titles of a cloud that otherwise remains there by reason of this difference between the Attorney General and the courts.

Mr. MANN. Let us see whether it does or not. We passed an act to provide that certain sales should thereafter be approved by the probate court or the county court in Oklahoma. The Attorney General held that that did not apply to sales made previously.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Of course, those sales made previously had not been approved by the probate court, because there was no authority for them to do so. They had been approved by the Secretary of the Interior because that was what the law required. Now you say the proposition is to require all those sales to be approved by the county court in order to remove the cloud on the title?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Supreme Court of Oklahoma held—

That the fact of death, under the act of May 27, 1908, authorized the conveyance of any interest of any full-blood heir to be approved by the probate court of Oklahoma, and many deeds have been taken in accordance with this decision, regardless of whether the allottee died prior to May 27, 1908, or not.

The United States district court rendered a decision to the same effect in the case of Harris v. Gale (188 Fed., 712), and no appeal was taken from this decision, which was rendered June 29, 1911—nearly a year ago. Judge Campbell, the United States district judge, in his opinion, says:

"There being no conceivable reason why Congress should have intended to distinguish between conveyances by full-blood heirs of inherited lands made subsequent to the act of May 27, 1908, where the ancestor died prior to that date and where the ancestor died subsequent to that date, and the language of the act itself not so clearly evincing such an intention as to preclude the contrary construction, it is decided that by the said act any full-blood Indian heir of any deceased allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes is authorized to convey any interest in the lands inherited by him from such deceased allottee, upon approval thereof by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of such deceased allottee, whether such death occurred before or after May 27, 1908, and the approval of such conveyance by the Secretary of the Interior is not required."

That was a decision of a United States district judge, and no appeal was taken from that decision.

Mr. MANN. That was covered by the act that was passed by the House and passed by the Senate. Does the gentleman pretend to say——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will get the act——

Mr. MANN. We had it in the House here for several weeks—the act passed by the Senate—and the act passed by the House did not correct that difficulty.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My understanding is it did not.

Mr. MANN. We need new Committees on Indian Affairs in both the House and Senate, then.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It did, perhaps, so far as removing clouds on the title was concerned, but it was thought that, unless we put in that proviso, in the future these sales would not require the approval of either the Secretary of the Interior or the probate court.

Mr. MANN. Here was a bill which passed the Senate with the express purpose of providing that the approval of the probate court should apply to cases where the person died prior to the act referred to, and we passed the bill in the House. It was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar here for several weeks, carefully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and carefully considered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]. He discussed it with me a number of times. And now gentlemen pretend to say that that bill as passed by the Senate and passed by the House utterly failed to accomplish the purpose for which it was intended. If so, it is a very severe reflection upon the department that approved it and the two Committees on Indian Affairs which reported it and the gentlemen who represented districts who were affected by it.

There comes along a proposition now, inserted by the conferees, that nobody understands and nobody is able to explain. It was inserted in conference. I will not say that nobody understands it, but nobody has endeavored to explain it. All the talk of the gentlemen now has been about the bill as it passed the Senate and the House and not about the proposition inserted by the conferees in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will give you the reason. The reason for the necessity of this act is that the Interior Department, through the Attorney General, has held that in cases where the death of an allottee occurred prior to May 27, 1908——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is referring to the report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House on the bill as it passed the Senate and has no relation to this amendment interjected into it by the conferees.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But section 9 of the act of May 27, 1908, would be apt, would it not, because it is now the law? Section 9 reads this way:

That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions upon the alienation of said allottee's land: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of said deceased allottee.

This bill is the substitute for that law, and that is all there is in this bill.

The law before was as I have just read. We have changed the language in this bill so as to read as follows:

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

This language, viz, "that no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in inherited allotted land shall be valid," and so forth, makes it more definite, and we insert the words "heretofore or hereafter" also to make it more definite. That is the language which, as I explained, would make it cover deeds made both before and after that act became a law. The new provision reads as follows, viz:

Shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

We have put in the words "county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death," because the county courts have jurisdiction of certain other matters beside matters of probate. The words "resident at the time of his death" are new.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will admit that this proviso, which is now in the conference report, was not in the bill as it passed the Senate and was not in the bill as it passed the House. The proviso now interjected for the first time in the conference report to which the gentleman has just referred is not in the bill as it passed the Senate and is not in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is substantially so. We have by this bill only made it more clear and definite. I have read both the original—or, rather, the present law—and our bill also, and compared them.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say it is a repetition of the same thing that is already in the bill, or that it is new?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have read to the gentleman section 9 of the act of 1908, and also the amendment to that, as amended by this bill.

Mr. MANN. Here is the proviso interjected by the conferees:

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court sitting in probate of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

I ask, was that provision in the bill as it passed the House or as it passed the Senate?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will look at the same page, in the next column beside it, he will find almost the same language in the old provision of the act of 1908, which is now the law.

Mr. MANN. But was this provision in the bill as it passed the Senate and as it passed the House?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Was this provision that I just read in the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not exactly.

Mr. MANN. Was it in the bill in any shape as it passed the Senate?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was in the bill in both shapes.

Mr. MANN. Then why did you put it in twice?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Because it was necessary, in order to get the bill to cover deeds both before that act of 1908 and deeds after that act of 1908; so as to cover both phases of the question, as I have already explained.

Mr. MANN. But if in the Senate bill we corrected the evil complained of—if it was an evil—under the original act the House does the same thing; and yet the gentleman brings in an entirely new provision and says it is already in the bill as it passed the Senate. Now, if it is already in the bill as it passed the Senate, what is the use of putting it in now? In fact, it is not in the bill as it passed the Senate, and no one seems to know the reason for it, and no gentleman has undertaken to give any reason for it. I defy anybody here or elsewhere to publicly tell why this provision is now inserted by the conferees.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will inform the gentleman why it was put in. I thought I had already done so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not do anything but discuss the original bill. I know why it was put in, but the reason for that I do not know. It was put in because, under the method of transacting conference business with the Senate, some distinguished Senators told the Senate conferees that they wanted this provision agreed to, and the Senate conferees would not agree to anything unless it was inserted. But that does not appear to me to be a sufficient reason for it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the reason that it was done—and I thought I had already stated to the gentleman—was that the terms of the bill, in the form in which it left the House after it was amended, would at least leave a doubt as to whether these sales would have to be approved by anybody, and in order to settle it we have stated that sales must be approved by the county court, sitting in probate, in the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

Mr. MANN. That may be a sufficient excuse for the gentleman, but I remember the bill as it passed the House. There was no possible excuse for saying there was any doubt about it. The bill expressly provided that these sales should be approved by the county court, whereupon they insert a new provision, which can not be explained on the theory that the House bill left it in doubt. It did not leave it in doubt at all. I dare say that the real reason for this amendment will not be known until it is put into execution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman point out where that provision is?

Mr. MANN. I have not the bill here, but I will read the report of the committee that the gentleman made, if he wants the report read, covering the whole case on the Senate bill. The gentlemen have printed it as a part of the conference report. The bill shows that it covers what the gentleman refers to. It was discussed on the floor of the House.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The report that was printed as a part of the conference report was the Senate report. The bill went back to the Senate in a different form from which it passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is the House report that is printed. The legend reads, "Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report." Mr. CARTER is the gentleman from Oklahoma in the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please state to us what objection he has to the county courts of Oklahoma, the courts that pass upon all probate matters affecting the titles of all the citizens of Oklahoma, passing upon Indian titles? And will the gentleman say why it is not a court of competent jurisdiction to pass upon these titles? In 1908, as I have stated frequently, the jurisdiction to approve these sales was given to this court by Congress and withdrawn from the Secretary of the Interior, and we are only amending the act of 1908, giving jurisdiction, by giving more explicit jurisdiction to that court and making it more definite.

Mr. MANN. But we let the county court practically pass upon the question of the ability of the Indians to make proper sales. We practically let the county court remove the restrictions upon Indian sales. Everyone here knows what that will accomplish. For years we have endeavored to protect the full-blood Indians or three-quarter blood Indians from being robbed of their land. We passed a bill two or three years ago, the so-called Clapp amendment, in reference to the White Earth Indian Reservation. We have had an investigation of that, both in the House and in the Department of Justice. Those investigations disclosed that a very large share of the Indians were being robbed—if that is the proper term to use—of their lands through sales which they were making, deeds which they were making. Now the gentleman proposes that the local authorities, purely and solely in sympathy with the local people, shall be the ones who shall judge and determine whether the allottees of any Indian are capable of transferring the title to the real estate. God help the Indians under such conditions!

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the law now. It was passed in 1908.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has been the law for four years.

Mr. MANN. That is the law as to certain cases.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; as to certain cases, as to those who died subsequent to that date.

Mr. MANN. As to certain cases. That is bad enough. The amendment of the conferees proposes that no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited or allotted lands, heretofore or hereafter made, shall be valid unless approved by the county court, intending to confer jurisdiction upon the county courts of Oklahoma to determine whether a full-blood Indian ought to sell his land.

Mr. FOSTER. It takes it entirely out of the hands of the General Government.

Mr. MANN. That is the intention.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is what the act of 1908 did.

Mr. FOSTER. And it gives the legal control to the county court of Oklahoma.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is what is done by the act to which this is an amendment.

Mr. MANN. The act to which this is an amendment did it in part, and the purpose of this act is to extend the authority of the original act.

Mr. FOSTER. And make it complete.

Mr. MANN. This is proposed to cover every case.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It only amends the act of 1908.

Mr. MANN. No one knows whether it applies solely to the Five Civilized Tribes or not, although that is the act that is amended. Here is a proviso that is a good deal broader than that act. I think that is the purpose of sticking it in here, to claim that it applies outside of the Five Civilized Tribes. Will any member of the conference committee deny that it does apply outside of the Five Civilized Tribes?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think anyone can assert that it does, with any expectation of sustaining that contention.

Mr. MANN. That it does or does not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The act applies specifically to and proposes an amendment to an act dated May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes"——

Mr. MANN. We often stick something into a law which the title does not cover. I venture to say it will be claimed that it applies to all sales, regardless of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Speaking as one of the conferees on the part of the House, I want to say that I can not refrain from resenting the intimation that the conferees put something into this bill for the purpose of doing something that perhaps ought not to be done. The intention of the conferees was to make it definite and certain, so that there could be no possible question about what this act does, and we, at least I, supposed that we were strengthening the act rather than doing something that would be contrary to what the act intended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In addition to what the gentleman from South Dakota has stated, I desire to call the attention of the House to the reading of the two acts. The caption of this act is "An act to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled 'An act for the removal of restrictions from the part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. MANN. And for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is the provision, and if the gentleman will listen he will see that it is correct. It is at the bottom of the first column on page 9439 of the RECORD of July 22, 1912, and he will find it is the provision of the old law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have read that a dozen times.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is no material difference whatever in the language, and I defy the gentleman to show it.

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blooded Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee.

That is the language, and here is our language:

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased was a resident at the time of his death.

That is not a material change, the fact being that there is no change here except the words "inherited allotted" and inserting the words "heretofore or hereafter," so as to apply to deeds made before this act and deeds made after this act. The other change is that this probate proceeding must be in the county of the residence of the Indian. There are only three changes, and with the exception of the words "heretofore and hereafter," these changes are not material changes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the original law provided that the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions on the alienation of said allottee's land—

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee.

The proviso which the conferees have injected into the bill is:

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless aproved by the county court, sitting in probate court, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

It is not confined, as is the original law, to such land already described in the law, but to any inherited allotted land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the exact language. The law itself used the words "interest in any land."

Mr. MANN. It did not. The gentleman is mistaken—

Interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land.

That is what the law reads. I do not care to have the gentleman misquote the law in my own time. Of course, I know that he does not intend to do it. There may be this point that the gentleman has: That this matter shall be passed upon by the probate court in the county where the deceased was a resident at the time of his death. Suppose he was not a resident of Oklahoma?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, if he was, the probate laws of that State would govern, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Of what State?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Of the State of Oklahoma. A man might die outside of the State and have lands there, and the probate court would undoubtedly have jurisdiction of the estate.

Mr. MANN. Here is a provision that it must be approved by the probate court, sitting in probate court, of the county where the deceased allottee was resident at the time of his death.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would not the gentleman, as a lawyer or a judge, give his opinion that that provision is merely directory and not mandatory, where the deceased died out of the State?

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of it, then? Here is a provision on which it is proposed to base title, providing it must be approved by the probate court of the county where the man resided when he died. If he does not reside in the county in Oklahoma, shall some foreign court pass on it? Unless he resides in one county in Oklahoma and owns land in another county, is it the county where the land is or where the man died that is to determine whether his land is to be sold or not? I should say that it was extremely improper for us to provide in our State that in Chicago a probate judge should determine whether the heirs should sell land in Cairo, Ill. What would the judge know about the land or the value of the land or the desirability of selling the land? Yet you propose to confer upon the probate court of one county an authority to determine whether the Indians ought to sell the land, as to capacity, and whether the price is fair in some other county, perhaps a different county.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the seamen's servitude bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, who must be of the same or higher grade or rating with those whose places they fill, and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections. And in all merchant vessels of the United States the sailors shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into three watches, which shall be kept on duty alternately for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; but this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays, but this shall not prevent the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage; and at all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor nine hours, inclusive of anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section the seamen shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and shall, upon demand, receive wages then earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to line 9, page 2, and ask whether or not, in the gentleman's judgment, the rest of the section applies to all vessels of the United States, whether upon the Great Lakes or other inland waters?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It does. It applies to those on the Great Lakes as well as those at sea.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask a further question. Take this for illustration: Suppose there is a vessel on the Great Lakes or other inland waters that runs only during the daytime. That happens very frequently. They run during the day and are tied up during the night. Would the gentleman still require three watches of firemen on those vessels; and if so, what duties would they perform?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. They would still require the three watches for the 24 hours' time, if they were 24 hours at sea.

Mr. MANN. But suppose they are not? We have lots of vessels that run across the lake in the daytime.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment the three watches would apply to a vessel under all circumstances.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the entire section.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold my amendment at this time if the gentleman desires to offer a substitute.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington has yielded the floor?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do for the purpose of his offering the substitute.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask the chairman of the committee to compare the original section with the substitute as it is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for section 1, page 1, line 1, the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That section 4516 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4516. In case of desertion or casualty resulting in the loss of one or more of the seamen, the master shall ship, if obtainable, a number of seamen equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of by desertion or casualty, and such seamen so shipped shall be of the same or higher grade or rating as those whose places they fill, and the master shall report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, otherwise he shall incur the penalty prescribed by the two preceding sections. And in all merchant vessels of the United States the seamen shall, while at sea, be divided into at least two and the firemen into three watches, which shall be kept alternately for the performance of ordinary work incident to the sailing and management of the vessel; but this provision shall not limit either the authority of the master or other officer or the obedience of the seamen when, in the judgment of the master or other officer, the whole crew is needed for the maneuvering of the vessel or the performance of work necessary for the safety of the vessel or her cargo. While the vessel is in a safe harbor no seaman shall be required to do any unnecessary work on Sundays or legal holidays, but this shall not prevent the dispatch of a vessel on regular schedule or when ready to proceed on her voyage; and at all other times while the vessel is in a safe harbor nine hours, inclusive of anchor watch, shall constitute a day's work. Whenever the master of any vessel shall fail to comply with this section the seamen shall be entitled to discharge from such vessel and shall, upon demand, receive wages then earned. But this section shall not apply to fishing or whaling vessels or yachts.'"

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the adoption of this substitute would be to perfect the verbiage of the bill. I do not like to criticize the grammar used in this measure, but I think any one who reads it carefully will find there are a great many lapses in the various sections. For instance, in this proposed section 1 seamen are constantly referred to as "seamen," except in line 10, where they are referred to as "sailors." Since in another part of the bill it is proposed to define "able-bodied seamen" it seems to me it would be better to make the terms applicable to the men supposed to be benefited by this bill uniform. In line 3 you say in this bill "the master must ship," which is not altogether good legislative form, "if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services," and so forth. The substitute proposes to add "a number of seamen," which is evidently the meaning intended by those who framed the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is in the present statute, and I presume that is why it is followed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. From line 1 down to line 9 is practically existing law.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The only difference, as I recall, is where it reads "the same grade" there has been inserted "the same or higher grade."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As we go along I intend to point out several other instances which may result in confusion. If a bill of this kind becomes a law it should be made as water-tight as possible, and I think I have raised one or two questions in this substitute which indicate that you have not fully covered the ground.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The grammar in that part of the section to which the gentleman refers may be bad. Your present committee is not responsible for that, however. It is the existing law, whether it be bad or good. The purpose is clear, and it does not seem to me to be helped any by the amendments that are proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The substitute is offered in good faith.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington desire to offer an amendment to the substitute?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman desires?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If it is voted down I am going to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "States," insert "except those running on lakes, bays, sounds, and rivers."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the effect of that amendment is this, that it is to limit the provisions in that section, from line 9 to the end, to vessels that are running at sea. All that portion of the section is new legislation. As it is to-day these vessels upon the Great Lakes and the inland waters are left to the local inspector to see when they are properly manned, and it is left to agreement, so far as I recall, what the watches shall be. Now, I do not believe there is any necessity for this provision so far as the Great Lakes or inland waters are concerned. Upon the Pacific coast, in the coastwise trade and overseas trade, I think the provision is not unreasonable, but, for instance, take on the Great Lakes. They have there the men on deck, men in the stewards' department, and they are divided in two watches. Now they propose to make the firemen in three watches, which the shipowners say would make a great deal of confusion in the running and regulation of their crews.

But that is not the reason why I oppose it so far as the Great Lakes are concerned, and there is no showing that it is necessary. So far as the Great Lakes are concerned, there has been no complaint at all, and if I understand the provision rightly it increases very greatly the number of firemen, and inasmuch as, so far as the committee knows, both the firemen and owners of the vessels are satisfied with the conditions upon the Great Lakes, it does not seem to me that this provision ought to be necessary. Now, I pointed out a while ago, take for illustration a vessel that runs for six hours and then is tied up for the rest of the day, or for 12 hours and is tied up for the night. What is the use of having three watches of firemen upon that vessel? Take one illustration along the line, and I give it because it illustrates a good many. A vessel may run from Seattle to Bellingham. For instance, they leave in the morning at 6 o'clock and arrive at Bellingham at about 6 o'clock, and they stay there during the night and then start back the next day and make the trip back. There are a great many vessels that run from one town to another only during the day, and it seems to me there is no necessity for three watches for firemen upon those vessels, whereas at sea, where men have to work 24 hours, I have no objection to it, and I think it is not an unreasonable provision, although after looking up the vessels upon the Great Lakes I was glad to find the work was not nearly as strenuous as it used to be or as I thought it would be, although it seems to me we might require this on the deep-sea vessels.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is true on the Great Lakes some of the modern vessels are so equipped that the labor in the fireroom is not so great and inconvenient as it was formerly, but that does not apply generally to vessels. As far as I am concerned, I really do not see any objection to an amendment to this section making it apply only to voyages of more than eight hours.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, it ought to be extended to more than 12 hours; it ought to be 18, at least.

Mr. MANN. Or 16.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] in favor of the amendment or against it?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am against it.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very important one; and I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] on ordering a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided and there were—ayes 27, noes 9.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll.
